7. Q. and A.: Zhang Weiwei on Why China Will Succeed Under the Communist Party – NYTimes Mr. Zhang, 57, who as a teenager spent three years in a Shanghai factory carv ing jade and in his 20s serv ed as an English interpreter for Deng Xiaoping, is now a professor of politics at Fudan Univ ersity in Shanghai, where he directs the Center for China Development Model Research, and a leading theorist of the "China model" of political and economic development. This holds that China under the Communist Party is on the right path and is destined to succeed. His most recent book, "The China Horizon: Glory and Dream of a Civilizational State," which is due out in English this year, continues that theme. Western critics need to get over their gloomy predictions about China, Mr. Zhang says, which have been wrong for decades. China is not going to collapse; polls show that most people are happier than ever; and the country's economy is certain one day to overtake that of the United States

comment by a writer who noted any benefits to making more material available in China, ev en if it suffers some censorship. My colleague and friend Michael Mey er, who has written two books on China, including one, The Last Days of Old Beijing, that has been published on the mainland, has complained that journalists seem to avoid mentioning that foreign China specialists who work closely with their publishers are often able to include material in their books that otherwise isn't av ailable in China. "The focus in these articles is always on monetary, not intellectual, exchange, and on what has been cut, not what has been preserved," he told me recently. His book is highly critical of the redevelopment of Beijing, and yet less than one page, total, was remov ed from the mainland edition. How America Should Wage 'Lawfare' in the South China Sea | The National Interest The law of sovereignty gov erns the question of territorial ownership—who owns which islands and reefs. It decides which claimant is entitled to reign over each of the physical features that dot the South China Sea. In contrast, the law of the sea (also known as maritime law) governs the question of maritime entitlements—in other words, which claimant (if any) can lawfully exert jurisdiction over the waters and seabed that are adjacent to any given piece of territory. Although both bodies of law touch on territorial questions, the laws can operate independently from each other. With some limited exceptions, a court could decide on the breadth of an island's maritime zones without knowing who owns it, and v ice v ersa. The United States has failed to make the most of the difference between the two sets of laws.

But how and where will China get the uranium to fuel them all? Will China need to resort to breeder reactors and reprocessing, with all the proliferation problems they incur? Or is there another way? The author suggests that between China's domestic uranium mining, uranium purchased on the international market, and uranium mined by Chinese-owned companies overseas, China could meet even the most ambitious target, thus avoiding the troublesome and dangerous path of reprocessing.

LINK TO FULL REMARKS: http://thepage.time.com/mccain-statement-on-russian-georgian-conflict/
ARLINGTON, VA – Today, in Erie, Pennsylvania, U.S. Senator John McCain delivered the following statement regarding the current conflict between Georgia and Russia:

"Americans wishing to spend August vacationing with their families or watching the Olympics may wonder why their newspapers and television screens are filled with images of war in the small country of Georgia. Concerns about what occurs there might seem distant and unrelated to the many other interests America has around the world. And yet Russian aggression against Georgia is both a matter of urgent moral and strategic importance to the United States of America.

"Georgia is an ancient country, at the crossroads of Eastern Europe and Central Asia, and one of the world's first nations to adopt Christianity as an official religion. After a brief period of independence following the Russian revolution, the Red Army forced Georgia to join the Soviet Union in 1922. As the Soviet Union crumbled at the end of the Cold War, Georgia regained its independence in 1991, but its early years were marked by instability, corruption, and economic crises.

"Following fraudulent parliamentary elections in 2003, a peaceful, democratic revolution took place, led by the U.S.-educated lawyer Mikheil Saakashvili. The Rose Revolution changed things dramatically and, following his election, President Saakashvili embarked on a series of wide-ranging and successful reforms. I've met with President Saakashvili many times, including during several trips to Georgia.

"What the people of Georgia have accomplished – in terms of democratic governance, a Western orientation, and domestic reform – is nothing short of remarkable. That makes Russia's recent actions against the Georgians all the more alarming. In the face of Russian aggression, the very existence of independent Georgia – and the survival of its democratically-elected government – are at stake.

"In recent days Moscow has sent its tanks and troops across the internationally recognized border into the Georgian region of South Ossetia. Statements by Moscow that it was merely aiding the Ossetians are belied by reports of Russian troops in the region of Abkhazia, repeated Russian bombing raids across Georgia, and reports of a de facto Russian naval blockade of the Georgian coast. Whatever tensions and hostilities might have existed between Georgians and Ossetians, they in no way justify Moscow's path of violent aggression. Russian actions, in clear violation of international law, have no place in 21st century Europe.

"The implications of Russian actions go beyond their threat to the territorial integrity and independence of a democratic Georgia. Russia is using violence against Georgia, in part, to intimidate other neighbors – such as Ukraine – for choosing to associate with the West and adhering to Western political and economic values. As such, the fate of Georgia should be of grave concern to Americans and all people who welcomed the end of a divided of Europe, and the independence of former Soviet republics. The international response to this crisis will determine how Russia manages its relationships with other neighbors. We have other important strategic interests at stake in Georgia, especially the continued flow of oil through the Baku-Tblisi-Ceyhan pipeline, which Russia attempted to bomb in recent days; the operation of a critical communication and trade route from Georgia through Azerbaijan and Central Asia; and the integrity and influence of NATO, whose members reaffirmed last April the territorial integrity, independence, and sovereignty of Georgia.

"Yesterday Georgia withdrew its troops from South Ossetia and offered a ceasefire. The Russians responded by bombing the civilian airport in Georgia's capital, Tblisi, and by stepping up its offensive in Abkhazia. This pattern of attack appears aimed not at restoring any status quo ante in South Ossetia, but rather at toppling the democratically elected government of Georgia. This should be unacceptable to all the democratic countries of the world, and should draw us together in universal condemnation of Russian aggression.

"Russian President Medvedev and Prime Minister Putin must understand the severe, long-term negative consequences that their government's actions will have for Russia's relationship with the U.S. and Europe. It is time we moved forward with a number of steps.

"The United States and our allies should continue efforts to bring a resolution before the UN Security Council condemning Russian aggression, noting the withdrawal of Georgian troops from South Ossetia, and calling for an immediate ceasefire and the withdrawal of Russian troops from Georgian territory. We should move ahead with the resolution despite Russian veto threats, and submit Russia to the court of world public opinion.

"NATO's North Atlantic Council should convene in emergency session to demand a ceasefire and begin discussions on both the deployment of an international peacekeeping force to South Ossetia and the implications for NATO's future relationship with Russia, a Partnership for Peace nation. NATO's decision to withhold a Membership Action Plan for Georgia might have been viewed as a green light by Russia for its attacks on Georgia, and I urge the NATO allies to revisit the decision.

"The Secretary of State should begin high-level diplomacy, including visiting Europe, to establish a common Euro-Atlantic position aimed at ending the war and supporting the independence of Georgia. With the same aim, the U.S. should coordinate with our partners in Germany, France, and Britain, to seek an emergency meeting of the G-7 foreign ministers to discuss the current crisis. The visit of French President Sarkozy to Moscow this week is a welcome expression of transatlantic activism.

"Working with allied partners, the U.S. should immediately consult with the Ukrainian government and other concerned countries on steps to secure their continued independence. This is particularly important as a number of Russian Black Sea fleet vessels currently in Georgian territorial waters are stationed at Russia's base in the Ukrainian Crimea.

"The U.S. should work with Azerbaijan and Turkey, and other interested friends, to develop plans to strengthen the security of the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan oil pipeline.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The U.S. should send immediate economic and humanitarian assistance to help mitigate the impact the invasion has had on the people of Georgia.

Our united purpose should be to persuade the Russian government to cease its attacks, withdraw its troops, and enter into negotiations with Georgia. We must remind Russia's leaders that the benefits they enjoy from being part of the civilized world require their respect for the values, stability and peace of that world. World history is often made in remote, obscure countries. It is being made in Georgia today. It is the responsibility of the leading nations of the world to ensure that history continues to be a record of humanity's progress toward respecting the values and security of free people.

"Thank you."

Here's a first stab:

The Foundation does life-saving work around the world, including getting HIV drugs to 8 MM people, getting nearly 28,000 African farmers to grow better crops to feed hungry people and it has helped get healthier food for American kids into 6000 schools. As for time as Sec of State --- I have represented the United States all over the globe, challenged world leaders over women's rights and human rights and defended our national interest every day. The notion that that anyone donating to the foundation was going to influence me in my job is absurd. (or "ludicrous")

I agree with Jen we should try to avoid Tuesday if that is possible. I like having her do it Wednesday, if we can make it til then -- saying a couple declarative sentences rejecting the basic premise [and expressing pride in Foundation's work], pointing to website, and then pivoting to positive message.

Friends - I wanted to lay out some issues to consider related to Clinton Cash and making news next week for discussion on Monday morning's call. Hope you are enjoying great weather in the meantime. JP

HRC ENGAGEMENT ON CLINTON CASH

The biggest question for this group is if and how HRC engages on Clinton Cash this week and what are the "two lines" she would deliver.

Reminder on this week's events for her. WJC on Today show on Monday; HRC in Vegas on Tuesday in front of the pool for an immigration event; fundraiser and lunch with the Mayor in SFO on Wednesday; LA fundraisers on Thursday; Bay Area fundraiser on Friday. All of the fundraisers are closed. To restate what we all discussed on Thursday and Friday - I would rather she not engage with press while we are in Vegas. Like to keep her on immigration and we handle response.

Below is a written statement Dan had drafted when we thought she might engage on this last week - so gives folks something to react to:

Statement from Hillary Clinton:
The suggestion that I or President Obama or any other senior official in this administration would ever allow decisions about national security to influenced by personal considerations – let alone some charitable donations – is absurd. Anyone who's had to sit in the Situation Room and make life and death choices would understand that. And if anyone ever donated to the Clinton Foundation in the hopes of influencing official government policy, they'd be a fool. Even the author himself has now admitted that he found zero evidence of any wrong-doing or quid pro quo. Unfortunately, the incredible life-saving work of the Clinton Foundation has gotten lost in these attacks. More than 9 million people with HIV/AIDS around the world have benefited from more affordable medicine because of the Clinton Foundation. Millions of American children have access to healthier food. Farmers in Africa are growing better crops. Women entrepreneurs are starting businesses. I'm so proud of the work that Bill, Chelsea, and all the professionals at the Foundation have done and continue to do. And I hope that people will judge the Foundation on that record of accomplishment, not on baseless conspiracy theories

CLINTON CASH RESPONSE/LAUNCH OF "THE BRIEFING"

On Tuesday morning we will launch The Briefing page on our website. This page will be where supporters and others can get information and points on what she is for, but also where we would post pushback on the book. Below is what we currently plan to post on Tuesday related to the book.

We are also considering a Podesta post that we would put on Medium and our site that unveils the concept of The Briefing, debunks the book a bit, and notes that while we will respond aggressively to attacks - we know that they are just designed to stop her bc R's know that she has right vision/policies to win and will not be distracted from our main highway of selling the positive. John and I discussed yesterday and think it is important that supporters and press know that we will deal aggressively with unfair attacks, but our real focus and her's is her proactive vision. Important that we do not appear beleaguered.

Clinton Cash Content for The Briefing:

1) a comprehensive post that debunks the book with all of our attacks in one place;

2) a short video narrated by Brian Fallon highlighting most egregious errors (we will need more time to do comprehensive version we discussed with HRC on Friday, but think it is worth doing short one for the book release on Tuesday);

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3) a number of social media products that our supporters can share and are designed to get buzz with press and supporters and further discredit the author and the book;

4) the products we have already put out over the course of the last week.

Re: Topline Results

Horse-race

The last survey was conducted in February. Now that the race has become more engaged, the ballot in New Hamphsire has tightened considerably, but Secretary Clinton maintains a double digit lead over Sanders (48% support for Secretary Clinton, 34% for Bernie Sanders, 2% for Martin O'Malley, 1% for Lincoln Chafee, 2% "other" and 13% undecided).

Ballot Tracking

	Feb 2015	June 2015	Δ
Difference (HRC-Sanders)	+61	+14	-47
Hillary Clinton	73	48	-25
Bernie Sanders	12	34	+22
Martin O'Malley	2	2	n/c
Lincoln Chafee		1
Jim Webb	3
Other	2	2	n/c
Don't Know	9	13	+4

Note: In February Jim Webb was asked. In June, Lincoln Chafee was asked.*

When undecided voters are pushed to make a choice, Clinton's lead breaks the 50% threshold while Sanders' vote share sees little movement (53% Clinton and 36% Sanders).

Sanders has raised his name identification and favorables considerably since we last polled. His name ID has increased from 52% to 77% and his favorability increased from 44% to 70%. Secretary Clinton's overal favorabilitiy is 85% with 12% unfavorable. Currently Sanders' very favorable is 46% while that for Secretary Clinton's is 39%.

The Sanders vote does not appear to be an anti-Clinton vote. Clinton is the second choice of most Sanders voters. Almost seven in ten (66%) of Sanders voters say Secretary Clinton is their second choice preference.

As of now, only about three in ten voters are familiar enough to have an opinion of Martin O'Malley or Lincoln Chafee, respectively.

As shown in the ballot progression below, after voters hear a positive profile of both Sanders and O'Malley, Sanders gains 3% and O'Malley gains 4% support. Once voters subsequently heard a positive profile of Secretary Clinton the ballot reverts to close to initial ballot support. Providing voters negative information about both Clinton and Sanders did not significantly change ballot support. In fact, the final ballot (which comes after negative information about both Clinton and Sanders) is almost identical to the initial ballot – a 13% HRC advantage, compared with an initial 14% advantage.

I know it's a long way off, but if the Democratic primary for President were held today, would you vote for…?

The Candidates

When asked what words they associate with Clinton, the responses were generally positive and describe Clinton as strong, intelligent and capable. They described Sanders as honest/trustworthy, a liberal/progressive and other generally positive characteristics.

However, when asked about recent coverage of Clinton, we see that the negative coverage has cut through. When asked what they've recently heard, most voters report hearing about the email scandal (32%), contributions to the Clinton Foundation (14%) or stories surronding Benghazi (10%).

When presented with a series of attributes and asked how well it applies to Clinton, voters were most likely to ascribe strength, ability to make tough choices and fights for people like you to Clinton. Clinton performed the worst on holding Wall Street accountable, being in touch with the lives of ordinary Americans and being genuine.

Half of all likely voters (51%) describe Clinton as moderate whereas close to half (46%) describe Sanders as very liberal. Notably, most primary voters describe themslves as liberal (50%) and only 38% describe themselves as moderate.

Message/Policy

While a majority of likely voters (50%) do not hold a position on TPP, among those who do the intensity of opposition is higher than the intensity of support (10% strongly support vs. 19% strongly oppose).

Meanwhile, a majority of voters prefer Clinton's approach to the banking industry of holding top executives accountable compared to Sanders' approach of breaking up the banks (regardless of whether we reference the recovering economy or not). It should be noted that neither candidate's name was associated with the position tested and that Clinton's weakest attribute is her abiilty to hold Wall Street accountable.

After voters hear a positive profile on both Sanders and O'Malley, Clinton's lead dops to a seven point margin (44% Clinton, 37% Sanders, 7% O'Malley, 1% Chafee, 2% other and 9% don't know). However, once voters hear a positive profile on Clinton she re-gains her double-digit lead (+12 points).

- On a topline basis the two paragraphs about Hillary Clinton tested, one focusing on values and the other policy, are comparable. Further analysis will be needed to see if they perform differently among sub-groups.

Secretary Clinton's top vulnerability tested in this poll is the attack that claims as Secretary of State she signed off on a deal that gave the Russian government control over twenty percent of America's uranium production, after investors in the deal donated over one hundred and forty million dollars to the Clinton Foundation. Half of all likely voters (53%) are less likely to support Clinton after hearing that statement and 17% are much less likely to support her after that statement.

After voters heard a battery of negatives on Secretary Clinton, their top concern was that she does not seem honest (16%).

Sanders' chief vulnerability tested is his record on guns. Almost a quarter of all voters (23%) are much less likely and more than six in ten (63%) are less likely to support Sanders after hearing that the NRA helped Sanders win a seat in Congress, that he opposed the Brady Gun Bill, supports allowing guns on passenger trains and supported a bill designed to protect gun manufacturers from lawsuits filed by families of victims of gun crimes like the Sandy Hook parents. As we heard in the recent focus groups, the issue of gun control is particularly salient given the recent shootings in Charleston, South Carolina.

Main Topics: Religious Forum, Ralph Reed, Marriage Infidelity and Morals, Cheating Scandal

Summary of Shift:

Commentary surrounding the forum on Religion both presidential candidates attended on Saturday dominated the election coverage this morning. Most saw McCain coming out as the winner, with his answers more direct and simple compared with Obama's more lengthy and descriptive answers. McCain's comments on the failure of his first marriage as his lowest moral moment were also highlighted as a new side of McCain he doesn't often show. Obama releases their fundraising numbers for the past month, raising 55 million dollars and doubling the amount McCain raised. Vice presidential speculation continues to run rampant, with Obama expected to name his choice any moment now this week, and then McCain expected to follow shortly after. McCain spoke in Orlando this morning at a VFW for Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Non-political news was dominated by the approaching Tropical Storm Fay which is threatening Florida and the Keys. Evacuations are already underway. Pakistani President, and Pro-West Ally Musharraf has announced that he will resign from his presidency in order to avoid bringing his country through a tumultuous impeachment process. Russia has promised to begin withdrawing troops from Georgia beginning today, however it is unclear where they will go or if they will stay in the disputed regions of South Ossetia. Flooding forced emergency evacuations of hikers and tourists in the Grand Canyon due to a dam breaking.

Controversy Over McCain's Fundraiser With Ralph Reed in Atlanta Today (CNN 08/18/08 6:34am)

MCCAIN: Could I ask our veterans just to stand so we can say thank you, thank you for your service to our country.

PAUL STEINHAUSER: You'll probably hear more words like that later this morning as John McCain speaks in Orlando at the annual convention of the veterans of foreign wars. But it's his fundraiser later in the day in Atlanta that's causing controversy. Ralph Reed, the onetime boy wonder of the Christian Coalition says he's involved with the event. Reed is closely connected to a corruption scandal that rocked Washington. Not surprisingly, Democrats have pounced. And the McCain campaign says there's no connection whatsoever between the fundraiser and Ralph Reed. As for McCain himself, he heads off the trail on Wednesday. Back to the ranch in Arizona and that gives Barack Obama the spotlight as we expect an announcement later this week on his running mate.

Did McCain Cheat? Fox and Friends Cover Obama Camp Claims of McCain Listening to Answers During Religion Forum (FNC 08/18/08 7:23am)

STEVE DOOCY: […] On Meet the Press yesterday, Andrea Mitchell, who's been following the campaign said that she'd heard from Obama's people that McCain probably overheard stuff. […]

GRETCHEN CARLSON: […] You're not supposed to hear anything, that was the way it was supposed to be set up. That he was in this cone of silence.

DOOCY: You're exactly right. So the Campaign Director, Rick Davis, for John McCain has written a letter to NBC's President, Steve Kappas and said, where is she coming up with this stuff? She is just reporting as if it's fact, these rumors from Obama. The whole context was, Andrea Mitchell was talking about how John McCain had a really good night. And Barack Obama did not. So now, the campaign is calling for a meeting with NBC because it simply is not fair.

DAVE BRIGGS: Rick Davis says they've abandoned non-partisan coverage of the presidential race. Fair and balanced? This is an era of text messaging, of blogging, of instant messages. You can for a minute see that the Obama people might have that theory. And Andrea Mitchell was only saying that the Obama people were saying that.

CARLSON: Because apparently McCain was on the way to the event while Obama was speaking, instead of actually being in a room by himself for that hour. So that's how these rumors started. But here's exactly what she said, "The Obama people must feel that he didn't do quite as well as they might have wanted to in that context, because what they are putting out privately is that McCain may not have been in the cone of silence." Ok, so actually if you're in the Obama camp, I'm not sure if you'd even bring this up. Because, the only thing that can come back to you is, well you're talking about this because you don't think your candidate did as well.

BRIGGS: And John McCain was extremely on message. And what they're talking about, some of the questions that Rick Warren asked, John McCain was already ready with that answer halfway through. But I think that is because he was extremely prepared. Rick Warren gave the candidates topics that he would cover. Nothing completely shocked these guys. Both

Ralph Reed Praises McCain's Performance at Religious Forum, Joel Hunter Considers Need For More Than Just Pro-Life Rhetoric To Bring Down Abortion Rate (FNC 08/18/08 7:27am)
STEVE DOOCY: […] There was a stark difference, when asked the question by Rev. Rick Warren, when does life begin. And John McCain was emphatic, he said at conception. Barack Obama talked for a little while, and then he eventually made the joke, that's above my pay grade. […]

JOEL HUNTER: […] John McCain, of course, wasn't deliberating. He was having a national opportunity for a national audience, came through with his particular view. Which happens to be my view also. But, the point was, while Obama was technically correct, it is imprecise, the bible doesn't speak specifically to it, McCain got the point.

RALPH REED: […] The other reason why it was such a great night for Senator McCain is it's not secret that he's had issues with this community over the years. And he really needs to connect with this constituency, and I think the question on when a child has human rights, […] McCain was strong, he was firm, he promised those folks he would be a pro-life president and then he bridged to a critical issue that Obama never even mentioned, and that is his judicial nominees and what kind of judges that he would appoint. Obama responded when he was asked, but McCain brought it up himself, pro-actively. That's a huge issue in this community, and again it was another example of McCain capitalizing and Obama I think having a huge missed opportunity.

HUNTER: I want to have a little counter-balance here. He's right, but, the simplistic answers, or the simple answers rather that McCain gave. Simply, that I'm going to be a pro-life president with pro-life policies. We've had that and the abortion rate has not gone down. So we got to have something more than just a pro-life president with pro-life policies to reduce the number of abortions.

McCain Gets Weepy; Will McCain's Emotional Moments Connect Him To Voters? (FNC 08/18/08 8:25am)
DAVE BRIGGS: That was very interesting to hear him talk about that. We haven't heard one thing about his first marriage. In light of the whole John Edwards scandal, some people were starting to talk about that failure. There's an interesting article in the politico.com last week that said DNC folks were tinkering with the idea of portraying his philandering on his first marriage and getting that out there as one of those negative attack ads. So it might have been a preemptive strike. I think people like to see John McCain really open up with some personal stories in that forum.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: I totally agree with you on the point of view of the personal stories, because a lot of people had been encouraging him to talk a little bit more about his POW experience and to talk a little bit more about his religious beliefs. As you could see if you watched this forum, it's tough for him to do. He started to well up from time to time. And I'm surprised there aren't articles this morning about analogies to Hillary Clinton welling up, how that helped her in New Hampshire. I'm surprised you're not seeing articles today about John McCain becoming more emotional will be a positive for campaign. We've seen President Bush well up. But John McCain, he strikes me as a tougher kind of guy, that doesn't want to well up. But I do think it was a good thing for him to well up.

STEVE DOOCY: A guy with a heart.

Dan Hill Examines McCain's Facial Expressions and Speaking Nuances During Religious Forum (FNC 08/18/08 8:30)
DAN HILL: […] What McCain does, is he jabs his hand for the audience, he's coming at you. Typical, standard contrast between their two personalities.

MCCAIN: My greatest moral failing, and I have been a very imperfect person, is the failure of my first marriage. It's my greatest moral failure.

STEVE DOOCY: What do you see?

HILL: What I see there is two things. One, is his lips are very tight, so he's really feeling some frustration, some anguish over this. He also shows just a slight bit of contempt. The corner of the lip, the mouth turns up in a smirk, and I think the contempt is toward himself for his failings here. So it was a successful moment for McCain, he wants to come across as speaking to honor, to sacrifice, to duty. This is after all, an election about authenticity, we have change that you can believe in versus straight talk express. And both these candidates were really on stage trying to say, I come from the heart, you can trust me, you can believe in me. And I think that McCain had a very good moment there.

NANCY ROTERING

Democrat for Congress

Friends,

The pro-peace, pro-Israel, J Street PAC has nationally endorsed Nancy Rotering for U.S. Congress. J Street PAC is part of an organization that stands for policies to advance shared U.S. and Israeli interests and Jewish democratic values.

"We're proud to support Mayor Rotering, a candidate who understands that hard-nosed diplomacy can succeed in promoting the interests of the U.S. and Israel. From her principled stance in favor of the Iran nuclear agreement, to her longstanding support for a two-state solution, Mayor Rotering embodies the diplomacy-first approach to supporting Israel that our movement seeks to advance," stated Ben Shnider, Director of Political Affairs at J Street.

Rotering joined with U.S. Senator Richard J. Durbin, the Honorable Abner J. Mikva and former U.S. Senator Adlai Stevenson III and Nancy Stevenson in her support of the Iran Deal, noting that rejecting the deal with no proposed alternatives would have been a disservice to all who are concerned about the security of the U.S., Israel and the world. Shortly after Rotering announced her support for the Deal, Mikva and the Stevensons retracted their endorsement of Rotering's primary opponent, Brad Schneider who opposed the Deal, and endorsed Rotering. They noted Rotering's independent voice and strong record for doing what's right for the people she serves.

Rotering stated, "I am honored to have the support of J Street in my campaign to represent Illinois' 10th Congressional District. We are reminded daily that hatred exists across the globe, particularly in the Middle East." Rotering continued, "As a deeply committed supporter of Israel, I believe that the U.S. should work with Israelis and Palestinians to arrive at a two-state solution. America's relationship with Israel cannot be driven by partisan politics, but rather must be a strong partnership among allies in democracy."

Sincerely,

Team Rotering

Subject: Earned Media Update

Hello All – Two quick things.

1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.

2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

Thanks. We'll try to keep these Earned Media Updates as often as we can.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: “This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn’t about emails, it’s about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they’d hold themselves.

Washington Post : “Jeb Bush used his private e-mail account as Florida governor to discuss security and military issues such as troop deployments to the Middle East and the protection of nuclear plants, according to a review of publicly released records.” [Washington Post, 3/15/15]

Wall Street Journal : “ But much like with Mrs. Clinton, the decision over which emails should be considered official and which remain private was made by Mr. Bush. It is unclear how many emails Mr. Bush withheld because he deemed them unrelated to state business. “He did exactly what Hillary did,” said Barbara Petersen, president of the First Amendment Foundation, a Florida-based government watchdog group. In turning over emails from his private account, she said, Mr. Bush and his staff “went through those emails and decided what were public-record emails and what wasn’t. […] The Wall Street Journal reports today: “When the Orlando Sentinel filed a public-records request for the emails from the private account about the legislative session, Mr. Rubio’s spokeswoman said they had been deleted.” (WSJ, 3/13/15)

Associated Press , “Several current and former governors who are considering a presidential run have found ways to delay or prevent public scrutiny of their communications while in office. That includes Republicans who have criticized their potential Democratic rival.” [AP, 3/7/15]

Roll Call , “But the legislative branch, which has effectively exempted itself from the Freedom of Information Act, can keep its emails and other correspondence hidden for 20 years or more — and some forever.” [Roll Call, 3/10/15]

Congressman Jason Chaffetz, who chairs the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, was caught by ABC News with a personal email address – a gmail account – on his Congressional business card. [ABC, 3/3/15]

In fact, people have called on Trey Gowdy to release his email if he wants to oversee this investigation. [MSNBC, 3/11/15]

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall Meeting New York, NY 06/12/08

Hello Big Campaign,

Unfortunately, our tracker was unable to get into tonight's event. In fact, many members of the press were not able to gain access. Below are the notes from the event taken from the Fox News' live coverage and our tracker's perceptions from outside the event.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- McCain audience pre-selected
- A dozen members of the press denied access to the event
- McCain hits Obama on taxes, Iraq, wanting to meet with Ahmadinejad
- McCain comments on how he'll reach out to young people, will continue to go on SNL, Comedy Central, MTV

New York, NY - McCain Town Hall Meeting 06/12/08

Background Details:
- Fox first reported the audience was a mix of people, Democrats, Republicans and Independents -- they corrected that report and said the McCain campaign distributed tickets to supporters and Republican groups
- Audience members all well dressed. Audience about 2/3rds male.
- Tracker did not get in -- he was denied access along with a dozen members of the press.

Speech Highlights:
- Town Hall meetings are important to the American people
- I'm running on a platform of reform, prosperity and peach
- We need to stop the gridlock in Washington
- We need to stop the out of control, pork-barrel spending. I'm proud to never have received an earmark.
- I led the investigations of Abramoff.
- "I know how to reform."
- I will veto every single earmark bill that comes across my desk and you will no their names.
- Americans are hurting. These are tough times. The question is how quickly are we going to get out of these tough times?
- We have to decrease our dependence on foreign oil.
- Nuclear energy needs to be part of that solution.
- I proposed a little holiday for those being hit hard by the high gas prices. My gas tax holiday will help low-income people.
- Peace is something we owe future generations of Americans. The great honor that I have at the town hall meetings is when the veterans come.
- We are in two wars. The central battlefield is Iraq -- we are succeeding there. It's going to be long hard and tough in Afghanistan.
- Obama wants to raise taxes, I want to lower taxes. He wants to make the choices on health care for families, I want to give them choices.
- I would much rather lose a political campaign than lose a war. I meant it then and I mean it today. We chose the right strategy and we are winning.
- Obama is in his 885th day since being in Iraq. And Obama has never once asked to sit down with Petraeus about the situation on the ground.
- Our troops will not come home with defeat -- like Obama wants -- they will come home with honor.

COMMERCIAL BREAK

Question and Answer:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q) N/A due to commercial

MCCAIN: There is nothing more nobling that to serve a cause greater than one's self. The American people want us to get beyond the name calling.

Q) Why is partisanship/divide getting worse every year? How will you overcome that?

MCCAIN: The time is right. The time is right because we crave approval -- and we read the poll numbers and they are horrible now. I believe if I reach across the aisle - the way we have in the past, because I've tried to get things done -- we gotta push our country first and not our party first. This is not a cheap shot -- but Obama has the most extreme record of any Senator. He doesn't have my record.

If you share the credit, people will work with you because of the reward.

Yes, there is going to be a change in Washington. There's going to be a right kind of change and a wrong kind of change. Obama wants to raise your taxes. I don't think you should raise anyone's taxes. He wants to sit down with the leader of Iran -- who is a very bad man. He wants to sit down with him without any preconditions. You shouldn't do this. You do what Nixon did with China, what Reagan did. Look, I'll sit down with anybody -- but not if it's going to increase their prestige.
Americans want us to work together. If we show them we can, we all will reap the rewards. I'm confidant I can do it. Americans will get it when I'm president.

Q) Small businessman asks - oil is sky-rocketing. No one is looking into how that is happening. It's very hard with average people today. Please do something for this.

MCCAIN: I believe there needs to be a thorough investigation into speculators. The whole international financial system needs a lot more transparency and oversight. I'm very angry with the oil companies not just because of their prices but also for not investing in alternative energy sources. Finally, we can't achieve oil independence overnight. But I'm convinced if we come together we can do it faster than most think. JFK got us to the moon. The people who are hurting most now are on a fixed income and small business like you. We owe you relief.

FOLLOW-UP: Stock market shouldn't control the commodities people use everyday. That's my question.

MCCAIN: I understand. And I think if there is any corruption it needs to be stopped. But my point is energy independence. You also mention the price of commodities. One of the reasons that's the case is because we subsidized ethanol -- that caused prices to sky-rocket. Sometimes you just have to say no. I was against the farm bill. You can't distort the market. Our farmers are the best in the world. I want to open up the world market for our citizens. Obama wants to renegotiate NAFTA.
My friend I am for free trade.

COMMERCIAL BREAK

Q) How will you feel about English as the official language?

MCCAIN: I'm ok with that.

Q) How do we make sure these people are taken care of by the tax relief package??? (question cut off by Fox)

MCCAIN: Some of the states in America have very high tax rates -- the businesses leave. This is true for the world. The corporate tax rate in America is 35% -- in Ireland it's 11%. Ireland is looking good. We need to cut the corporate tax rate. The only country in the world with a higher tax rate is Japan. At the county level, we need to relieve them of their burden as well. We need better communication across federal, state and county governments.

Q) How will your campaign reach out to young voters? Obama is taking up a lot of these voters because of the variety of mediums they use to reach out to us. Also, young people are turned off by Bush policies.

MCCAIN: I respect Barack Obama. I want to reach out to young people -- that's why I go on SNL, Comedy Central, MTV. When I do communicate with young people and of course the Internet is the way to do that, I need to show them that I'll give them a safe and secure future. I intend to compete in the battle of ideas.

Q) The only thing I disagree with you on tonight -- is that I do believe you are a hero. Father of two kids in public school. Hispanic American. I am conservative economically and socially. What are you looking for in appointments to the Supreme Court?

MCCAIN: We are going to have to compete heavily for the Hispanic community. I did well with that vote in Arizona. Can you tell me a little more about your background?

FOLLOW UP: I became an attorney and a father -- I came to know that my beliefs were more in line with Republicans, especially you. I like your character -- so what character would you appoint?

MCCAIN: I think Justice Alito and Roberts are great examples. These guys are kind we want on the court. I will make sure that any nominee that I recommend has a strict interpretation of the Constitution and does not legislate from the bench. Incredibly to me is that Obama voted against Alito and Roberts. It is the President to make these nominations. It is the job of the Congress to judge whether they are qualified not if you like them. Elections have consequences.

Closing Remarks

I thank you for being here tonight. My life, my experience, my judgment -- I understand the challenges we face. I will always put my country first and I will not let you down.

Bloomberg: “Paul Misstates Clinton Record on Islamic State Risk”

By Jonathan Allen

September 8, 2014, 4:43 p.m. EDT

Republican Senator Rand Paul falsely accused Hillary Clinton, a potential Democratic rival for the presidency in 2016, of underestimating the threat posed by Islamic State -- and he did it at least twice last week.

“Hillary Clinton has said ISIS is not a threat to the United States,” Paul said on Fox News Channel’s “Hannity” on Sept. 3. The Kentucky lawmaker repeated that assertion about the former secretary of state to Fox’s Bill Hemmer two days later, noting his belief that those were Clinton’s “exact words.”

Trouble is, while secretary of state, Clinton sought to stop the rise of extremist groups such as Islamic State by calling for arming moderate rebel factions in Syria, according to her memoir, contemporaneous reporting by the New York Times and U.S. officials who were involved in the debate at the time.

Clinton allies jumped on Paul's claim.

"We've always known Rand Paul's erratic views, ranging from his belief in extreme isolation as a foreign policy principle to his absolute opposition to raising the minimum wage, are dangerous for our country and for the future of Americans," said Adrienne Elrod, communications director for the pro-Clinton group Correct the Record. "But now he's taken it to a whole new level apparently, by flat-out making stuff up - a perilous tactic taken by someone who wants to be America's next president."

Paul advisers declined to comment.

Last month, Clinton made headlines for saying that Islamic State arose because President Barack Obama failed to adequately back moderate opposition groups in Syria, a remark that drew criticism from the president's supporters.

Media Matters for America: "This Conspiracy Theorist's Benghazi Book Is Full Of Conspiracy Theories"

By Hannah Groch-Begley

September 8, 2014, 1:38 p.m. EDT

WND reporter Aaron Klein's history of outrageous conspiracy theories has already cast serious doubt on the credibility of his new book, The REAL Benghazi Story. But the book itself contains major distortions of reality, including selectively-edited evidence and distorted facts, reconfirming Klein's commitment to pushing convoluted hoaxes.

Klein's book, which Media Matters obtained a copy of in advance of its September 9 release, claims to "expose" the "truth" about the 2012 attacks on U.S. facilities in Libya, revealing "What The White House and Hillary Don't Want You To Know." Included are a few of the more conspiratorial analyses that Klein has previously pushed at the birther website WND, such as the claim that Benghazi is linked to the Boston Marathon bombing -- because a handful of members of a jihadist group may have taken part in the Benghazi attacks, and that group also "is behind" a magazine "thought to have provided bomb-building instructions" for the accused marathon bombers.

Klein's book does include one seemingly "new" Benghazi theory, which is also entirely false. Klein attempts to attack former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton for what he claims is her previously "unreported role" in Benghazi, by falsely claiming she must have personally approved security conditions at the Benghazi compound.

The Benghazi mission was unusual for government buildings overseas, as it featured a CIA annex that was separate from the diplomatic compound, roughly a mile apart. Typically government agencies are housed together in the same building, which is called "co-location." According to Klein, State Department regulations would have required Clinton to personally sign a waiver permitting the Benghazi mission to be set up like this, and thus provided "personal approval of security conditions at the compound":

"...it can now be said that Clinton personally provided the legal waivers for U.S. personnel to occupy that death trap of a mission. This largely unreported detail was confirmed in the Senate's January 2014 report on Benghazi. Senate investigators found the Benghazi facility required a special waiver since it did not meet the minimum official security standards set by the State Department.

"Some of the necessary waivers, the Senate affirmed, could have been issued at lower levels within the State Department. However 'other departures, such as the co-location requirement, could only be approved by the Secretary of State.' ... This means Clinton herself approved some aspects of the U.S. special mission, including separating the mission from the seemingly more protected CIA annex. In doing so, did Clinton know she was approving a woefully unprotected compound? If not, then at the very least she is guilty of dereliction of duty and the diplomatic equivalence of criminal negligence."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the fact is the Benghazi mission did not require this kind of waiver. The State Department regulations Klein is referencing lay out the responsibilities of the Secretary under the Secure Embassy Construction and Counterterrorism Act, or SECCA. But as the State Department Accountability Review Board (ARB) that investigated Benghazi explained, the Benghazi facility was exempted from SECCA. SECCA applies to diplomatic facilities, such as consulates, that are officially notified to the host government. Instead, the special mission in Benghazi was a "temporary, residential facility, not officially notified to the host government," and as such SECCA rules -- waivable or not -- did not apply.

In fact, the document approving the set up and security conditions for the compound has been public since at least September 2013, when it was posted online by Al Jazeera America. It clearly shows the signature of Under Secretary Patrick Kennedy, as well as clearance from a number of other low-level officials.

State's ARB report acknowledged that the Benghazi mission's "'non-status' as a temporary, residential facility made allocation of resources for security and personnel more difficult." They recommended State develop minimum security standards for temporary facilities and encouraged co-location in the future. Clinton accepted the recommendation and began implementing it before leaving office.

Real flaws in security at Benghazi do not, however, justify Klein's attempt to ignore the facts and claim Clinton personally signed waivers approving the compound.

Beyond these details, Klein's book for the most part simply rehashes a number of the same debunked Benghazi myths conservatives have been pushing for almost two years.

For example, he devotes an entire chapter to the talking points controversy -- or what he calls the "duplicitous editing affair" in which the Obama administration "scrubb[ed] references to terrorism" while stressing the influence of an anti-Islam Youtube video. Klein claims that the inter-agency editing process that produced the talking points used by an Obama administration official during Sunday show interviews was not only "a large-scale, purposeful deception of the American public," but stirred "further riots across the Islamic world." In reality, it's long been clear that the talking points were edited to protect the ongoing law enforcement investigation of the attacks and that the video, which sparked worldwide protests killing at least 50 people, played a role in the attacks.

Klein also repeats the claim that the administration immediately had access to video footage of Benghazi which disproved their initial narrative that the assault had emerged out of a protest. But the protest claim originated with the CIA immediately after the attacks, while the video footage wasn't recovered from the site by the FBI for at least another two weeks. And he pushes the theory that the Obama administration didn't send in air support to assist the Americans when they came under fire because they "didn't want to draw more attention" to the U.S. mission. In fact, as military experts have repeatedly said, they did not have the capabilities to send in support, and doing so may have been more dangerous for Americans.

But one of Klein's shadiest tactics is to selectively edit claims from reputable sources to falsely suggest that they support his theories.

For example, Klein selectively quotes congressional testimony from Gregory Hicks, the foreign service officer who was second-in-command of the Libya mission to then-Ambassador Chrisopher Stevens on the night of the attack, to accuse Clinton of being "the very reason Ambassador Stevens was in the compound in the dangerous anniversary of 9/11." Klein uses Hicks' words to argue that Stevens visited the Benghazi compound because Clinton wanted to turn it into a permanent post, and thus is responsible for him being there. But Klein hides the key part of Hicks' testimony, in which the deputy specifically said Stevens "chose to go" to Benghazi himself.

Similarly, Klein selectively quotes from the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence investigation into Benghazi. As the investigation explained, in the hours after the attacks the CIA station chief in Libya had sent an email to superiors revealing the attacks were preplanned terrorism. Klein uses this point to rehash the false claim that the Obama administration purposefully ignored that email for political purposes, supposedly covering up the realities of terrorism in the region. But as the Senate noted in the very same report, "as a standard practice" the CIA does "not base analysis on emails and other informal communications from the field," so the email could not influence administration statements. Klein failed to include that crucial detail.

Reality is not a central focus of The REAL Benghazi Story, however. Given that Klein once suggested Obama was Satan because a fly landed on him during a press conference, perhaps that was to be expected.

Associated Press: "Clinton Juggernaut Hits 2014 Campaign Trail"

By Ken Thomas

September 8, 2014, 3:19 p.m. EDT

The Clinton juggernaut hits the midterm campaign trail this week as the power couple lends fundraising prowess and their seal of approval to Democratic candidates shunning an unpopular President Barack Obama. For Hillary Rodham Clinton, the events with Democratic donors and activists are keeping her profile high as she weighs a second bid for the presidency.

The Clintons are working to help female candidates and boost turnout in conservative-leaning states like Arkansas, where Bill Clinton was governor before becoming president, and Kentucky, where Democrat Alison Lundergan Grimes talks up her alliance with the Clintons, not Obama.

Hillary Clinton's time and political currency remains especially highly coveted.

"She's a natural fit in any state at the moment," said Democratic strategist Donna Brazile, a longtime adviser to the Clintons.

The same can't be said of Obama, whose approval ratings have tumbled and who has kept his campaigning mostly at off-camera events with financial donors. He isn't expected to campaign in states like Alaska, Arkansas, Louisiana and North Carolina where Senate control could be decided. Republicans are driving for the six-seat gain they need to grab the Senate majority, with their highest hopes in conservative states Obama lost in 2012.

Hillary Clinton, who recorded an automated get-out-the-vote call for New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo and his running mate, Kathy Hochul, headlines a fundraiser for Senate Democrats at her Washington home on Tuesdayand a New York reception for Democratic governors on Friday. By Sunday, the Clintons will join thousands of Democrats in Iowa to honor retiring Sen. Tom Harkin in the state that helped propel Obama, at Mrs. Clinton's expense, to the presidency.

The shift to the Clintons, according to interviews with more than a dozen Democratic leaders and operatives, is part history, part circumstances. Party activists tend to look ahead to a successor during a president's second term and Mrs. Clinton's potential to become the first female president - without an obvious Obama-like primary challenger right now - has made that interest more acute. Obama's approval ratings remain stuck in the low 40s, forcing some Senate incumbents to distance themselves.

Obama's turbulent dealings with Republicans in Congress have fueled the shift, raising hopes that his successor will break the logjam, some of the activists say.

So the Clintons are extending their long history of helping their friends.

"There's a tremendous positive feeling for getting two for the price of one," said Mitch Ceasar, a Florida lawyer and member of the Democratic National Committee.

Obama can still raise millions for Democrats and aides say he'll assist candidates in states where he can be most helpful, in individual House races and places like Florida, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin.

Obama could make last-minute appearances in states like Georgia and North Carolina to boost turnout among black voters. But so far, many Democrats have avoided him in public.

During Obama's Labor Day rally in Milwaukee, for example, Wisconsin gubernatorial candidate Mary Burke did not appear at the president's side.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And in North Carolina, vulnerable Democratic Sen. Kay Hagan had to appear with Obama during his visit to a convention of veterans- but first, she released a statement criticizing his record on veterans health care.

The Clintons, meanwhile, don't have the same issues. And help they provide now could benefit Hillary Clinton if she seeks the party's nomination in 2016.

Bill Clinton has campaigned with Grimes, a longtime family friend who calls herself a "Clinton Democrat" in her bid against McConnell, and two Arkansas allies, Sen. Mark Pryor and gubernatorial candidate Mike Ross, Clinton's campaign driver back in 1982.

Since Labor Day, Clinton has traveled to Connecticut to help Gov. Dan Malloy; Maine on behalf of Rep. Mike Michaud, who faces GOP Gov. Paul LePage; Miami to help former Gov. Charlie Crist, the ex-Republican who is seeking his old office, and New Orleans to raise money for Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu. The former president will be in Atlanta next weekend to raise money for Senate candidate Michelle Nunn before joining with the former first lady in Iowa.

During a New York fundraiser last week to support House Democrats, Bill Clinton told attendees that Republicans in Congress had stoked conflict and division instead of finding common ground, noting dozens of votes to repeal Obama's health care law. The former president also spoke of the need to raise the minimum wage, which he increased as Arkansas governor and as president, according to a Democratic official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the event was private.

The former secretary of state's campaigning comes with risks - her approval ratings have fallen in the past when she engages in partisan activities. Republicans are already looking to engage her at every turn.

When Mrs. Clinton called climate change the "most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face" at a Nevada energy conference last week, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul was quick with a retort. "I don't think we really want a commander-in-chief who's battling climate change instead of terrorism," Paul told Fox News.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Ready for Hillary plans November strategy meeting with top national donors"

By Philip Rucker

September 8, 2014, 8:18 p.m. EDT

Ready for Hillary, the super PAC laying the groundwork for Hillary Rodham Clinton's potential 2016 presidential campaign, has called a meeting of its top national donors to discuss its strategy following the November midterm elections.

The super PAC has invited members of its National Finance Council to a daylong summit in New York City on Nov. 21 to a discussion of the group's next steps as it prepares for Clinton's likely entry into the presidential race.

Clinton, a former secretary of state who would be the overwhelming favorite for the Democratic nomination, has said she will make her decision about the 2016 race early next year. Meanwhile, Ready for Hillary has been building a grassroots infrastructure on her behalf and has signed up more than 2.5 million supporters.

Craig Smith, a senior adviser to Ready for Hillary and a longtime political adviser to former President Bill Clinton, invited top donors to the summit in an e-mail sent Monday night and obtained by The Washington Post.

"This meeting will be the premier opportunity to hear from those individuals who will be shaping the next few years in our Nation's politics and a chance for Finance Council Members to come together and meet one another while we wait to hear what Hillary will decide," Smith wrote.

At least 222 donors have signed up as co-chairs of Ready for Hillary's National Finance Council — a commitment that requires donating or raising $25,000 each, according to a membership list obtained by The Post this summer. More than 600 other donors are considered members of the finance council, required to give or raise $5,000 each.

Smith invited the co-chairs to gather for a dinner on Nov. 20, the night before the broader meeting.

Politico blog: Joe Scarborough: "Obama right on ISIL response"

By Joe Scarborough

September 8, 2014, 1:23 p.m. EDT

I have been a consistent critic of President Obama's policy initiatives. I called the stimulus package a steaming pile of garbage, said his health care plan was bad for America, and said his massive spending programs would undermine American capitalism.

I repeatedly warned against tripling the number of troops in Afghanistan, I condemned the administration's expansive drone policy, and have always had concerns about a management style that leaves the president isolated in D.C. and inside his own White House.

But when it comes down to facing down the greatest threat since 9/11, I think this president has it just about right. Let Republicans and neocons like Hillary Clinton play the cynical game that politicians love to play by second guessing his lack of action in Syria and speculating about what might have been.

Let's not argue over counter realities and instead stick to the reality that confronted the White House and Congress. Neither Democrats nor Republicans would have supported a third war against a Muslim country in less than a decade even if Barack Obama wanted to launch a full-scale invasion into Syria. And as Dwight Eisenhower taught us during the Suez Crisis in 1956, less is usually more when it comes to military operations in the Middle East.

Because the president refused to rush in with guns blazing in the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant crisis, when he goes before the American people on Wednesday, Mr. Obama will talk about launching a military operation that has the support of the Arab League, the United Arab Emirates, Egypt and most of the Arab world.

And for first time in a long time, United States troops will be entering a battle against an evil force in the Middle East with the support of most Arab leaders.

It's only a start in our battle against ISIL, but it is a good start.

Bloomberg View: Albert R. Hunt: "Could Jim Webb Mount Credible Challenge to Clinton?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Albert R. Hunt

September 7, 2014, 11:00 a.m. EDT

Jim Webb could be Hillary Clinton's worst nightmare.

The former one-term Virginia senator and Vietnam War veteran is making sounds about running for president as a Democrat. He was in Iowa last month; a New Hampshire trip may be in the offing, and he's giving a major speech at the National Press Club in two weeks.

He seems an improbable candidate. He has taken illiberal positions, was President Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary, has few relationships within the Democratic Party, and has no serious fundraising network.

What he does possess is a long-held and forceful opposition to U.S. interventions in Iraq and Libya, and potentially Syria, as well as solid anti-Wall Street credentials. In Democratic primaries, these may be Clinton's greatest impediments to rallying a hard-core activist base.

In 2002, Webb warned of the perils of invading and occupying Iraq; he has been proven right by the violence and sectarian strife of the post-Saddam Hussein era. As a senator, Clinton voted for the war and supported it for years. She recently acknowledged she had been wrong.

As secretary of state, Clinton was the chief advocate in the Barack Obama administration for intervening against Muammar Qaddafi. When the Libyan dictator was toppled and killed in 2011, she thought it would be her signature foreign-policy achievement.

Webb, then a senator, adamantly opposed this venture. The U.S. has since withdrawn its personnel from Libya, and radical jihadists now occupy a compound belonging to the U.S. embassy.

Clinton recently said she disagreed with Obama's decision not to intervene in the Syrian civil war. Webb warns that the Syrian opposition includes not only elements friendly to the U.S., but also the radical Islamic State forces that have wreaked mayhem there and in Iraq, murdering thousands and beheading two American journalists. Syria, he has warned, is "Lebanon on steroids."

Clinton has close ties to Wall Street, a source of campaign funds for her and the Clinton Foundation. Since leaving office, she has received large speaking fees from hedge funds, private-equity companies and big banks such as Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

Webb, 68, has long taken a populist, anti-Wall Street stance. In 2007, he delivered the Democratic response to President George W. Bush's State of the Union address. Webb declared that the health of American society should be measured "not with the numbers that come out of Wall Street, but with the living conditions that exist on Main Street."

He pushed a measure to slap a special tax on big bonuses paid out by Wall Street companies that received government assistance during the financial crisis. When it failed, he complained that Democrats, beholden to Wall Street, killed it.

If Webb decides to run -- fearlessness and unpredictability are his trademarks -- there's plenty of ammunition against him. He's against gun control, and he has made comments that angered feminists, many of whom consider Clinton a cause as well as a candidate, and environmentalists. He also has been involved in numerous personal controversies.

In a recent Virginia Senate debate, Republican Ed Gillespie sought to paint the moderate Democratic incumbent, Mark Warner, as too left, citing occasions when he didn't join Webb in voting along a more conservative line.

The maverick lawmaker had a few notable successes, passing a major veterans' education bill, putting criminal justice reform on the agenda, and calling for a pivot to Asia before Obama was elected. He has criticized executive overreach by both Bush and Obama.

A decorated war hero -- he received the Navy Cross for "extraordinary heroism" -- and author of nine books, he would run principally on the issues most likely to cut Clinton: opposition to an interventionist-centered foreign policy and softness toward Wall Street. He would bring more authenticity to these two issues than any other would-be Clinton challenger. In Iowa, he made no secret of his criticism of Clinton's tenure at State.

Clintonites will dismiss the Webb threat by pointing to his political weaknesses. But here's a safe bet: They will closely monitor his Sept. 23 Press Club speech.

The Week column: Damon Linker, senior correspondent at TheWeek.com: "Bring on the Hillary Clinton-Rand Paul smackdown!"

By Damon Linker

September 9, 2014, 6:02 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] If you want an election that clarifies the choices facing voters, then you can't do better than a match-up between the centrist and the libertarian

I'll be honest: The prospect of Hillary Clinton winning her party's nomination without even trying and then coasting to victory in the general election against a lame Republican opponent leaves me feeling depressed, and not only because I'm paid to write about politics.

Our political system ought to do better than that — by giving the American people a genuine choice. But most of the likely match-ups wouldn't do that.

Clinton is a centrist Democrat all the way down. She's spent the past 22 years near the peak of power inside the Beltway. If she ends up squaring off against Paul Ryan, Marco Rubio, Chris Christie, Jeb Bush, or (God help us) Mitt Romney, it will be a contest played out from deep within the reigning Washington consensus.

The candidates will pretend to disagree about foreign policy, but it will be an act, with neocon-ish Clinton perfectly matching her opponent's blustery bellicosity point for point.

On domestic policy, Clinton will promise to defend ObamaCare while reforming its least popular and successful elements. She'll also signal her intent to do what Democrats always do, which is to protect government programs and keep tax rates at their current level or raise them slightly on the top end.

The Republican, meanwhile, will do what Republicans always do, which is to rail against government and promise tax and spending cuts that everyone knows will translate into tax cuts for the wealthy alone, sending the deficit back into the stratosphere. (Despite what Republicans say in their speeches, their actions reveal that it is not the deficit that matters to them, but rather cutting taxes on the highest earners while protecting government programs that benefit the aging white voters who form the base of their party.)

There is only one realistic way to break out of this tired state of affairs. And no, it doesn't involve a run by Ted Cruz, Rick Santorum, or any other candidate from the GOP's delusional there-are-more-general-election-votes-on-the-far-right-than-in-the-center caucus. If someone from that faction manages to land the nomination, I fully expect the median-voter theorem to be vindicated and Clinton to win in a historic landslide.

No, the only scenario that promises to deliver a genuine contest and spark a serious, important debate is one that involves an electoral smackdown between Clinton and Rand Paul. That is the presidential match-up America needs.

Let me be clear: I am not a libertarian. It's very unlikely I will cast a vote for Paul or any other Republican in 2016. I anticipate supporting Clinton in the general election.

But I nonetheless believe that American democracy would benefit from a contest that forces the establishment candidate (Clinton) to defend herself and her positions against a challenger who presents a genuine alternative — and one that confounds at least some of the pieties that have gripped the GOP through the last several election cycles.

The biggest contrast would be felt on foreign policy. Paul's expressions of support for a military response to ISIS have obscured just how skeptical he is of the GOP's reflexive, unmodulated hawkishness, which inspires nearly all of its leading figures — as well as a good many Democrats, very much including Hillary Clinton — to propose military force as an all-purpose solution to nearly every problem in the world. Paul appears eager to break from this consensus in favor of a stricter calculation of America's national interests, and with those interests defined more narrowly than neocons and liberal interventionists tend to do.

Paul's desire to reorient America's foreign policy extends to other aspects of the national security state that has emerged in the U.S. since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. As Americans learned from his blockbuster 13-hour filibuster on March 6, 2013, Paul strongly opposes warrantless surveillance and extra-judicial killings, especially when American citizens are targeted. Clinton's position on these issues, by contrast, is...somewhat more difficult to pin down.

Paul's libertarian suspicion of government police powers even led him to criticize the Ferguson, Missouri, police department in the wake of the shooting death of the unarmed 18-year-old Michael Brown. In a column for Time, Paul declared that "it is impossible for African-Americans not to feel like their government is particularly targeting them." That might sound like an uncontroversial position, but for a member of a party that has defined itself since the era of Richard Nixon as a champion of law-and-order and unapologetically tough on crime, it is.

When it comes to taxes and entitlements, Paul is closer to being a mainstream Republican — though his libertarian commitments give us reason to think he may be slightly more willing than other members of his party to match tax cuts with real reductions in spending. I don't support slashing either taxes or spending, but if we're going to have the first, it's far better to combine it with the second than to pay for the tax cuts by increasing levels of public debt.

Now none of this means that Rand Paul will have an easy time on the campaign trail. On the contrary, as Ross Douthat argued last spring, Paul will likely face long odds in the primaries precisely because his agenda simultaneously challenges so many elements of the GOP electoral coalition.

And even if he does somehow run the Republican gauntlet and manage to come out at the head of the pack, he'd still have to face the Hillary Clinton juggernaut in the general election. Despite recent hype about a "libertarian moment," I tend to think Clinton would do quite well in such a match-up.

But I could be wrong. And wouldn't it be clarifying to test the proposition?

New York Times column: Ambs. to the USSR and Russia Jack F. Matlock, Jr., Thomas R. Pickering, and James F. Collins: "Give Diplomacy With Russia a Chance"

By Jack F. Matlock, Jr., Thomas R. Pickering, and James F. Collins

September 8, 2014

The crisis over Ukraine has all but frozen official communication between the United States and Russia. The Russian reaction to the political upheaval in Kiev — the absorption of Crimea, and the armed intervention in eastern Ukraine — and the American responses to those actions have brought about a near-complete breakdown in normal and regular dialogue between Washington and Moscow. Relations between the two capitals have descended into attempts by each side to pressure the other, tit-for-tat actions, shrill propaganda statements, and the steady diminution of engagement between the two governments and societies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reports from the NATO summit meeting that ended in Newport, Wales, on Friday indicate that the United States and its allies will respond to Russia's intervention and violence in Ukraine with an escalation of their own — including further sanctions, enhanced military presence in front-line states, and possibly greater support for Ukraine's armed forces. This amounts to more of the same, with little if any assurance of better outcomes.

What the Western strategy lacks is an equally vigorous diplomatic approach to ending this conflict. Diplomatic efforts should aim to provide Ukraine and its neighbors with a future that can sustain peace and security for all countries in the area; re-establish respect for the core principles of Europe's political order; and open the way for more productive American-Russian relations.

As three former United States ambassadors who served in Moscow, we believe that the time is right for American leadership in a serious diplomatic effort to achieve these ends. Each of us has seen the high price paid when relations and dialogue between Washington and Moscow break down, as in the effort to prevent Baltic independence at the end of the Soviet era, the Kosovo crisis and the insurgency in Chechnya.

Each time relations broke down, there was a high cost to the cause of peace and security for both the United States and Russia, as well as their allies. Our experience convinces us that creative, disciplined, serious active diplomacy — through both official and unofficial channels — provides the one path out of destructive crises and a reliance on violence and confrontation. So-called Track 2 dialogue between nonstate actors — experts and groups of individuals on both sides — can also play a useful role.

For now, fortunately, a cease-fire agreement announced on Friday by President Petro O. Poroshenko of Ukraine and President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia appears to be holding. It is also encouraging that the parties have begun discussion about how to maintain the halt in fighting and address the political issues that will have to be tackled to bring about a lasting settlement.

There is ample reason to treat this opening with caution. But this potential opportunity should not be allowed to slip away. This is a moment when American leadership will be essential. The terms of any durable cease-fire must, of course, provide for adequate numbers of international observers, most appropriately from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, to ensure that no side exploits the halt in fighting.

Any lasting agreement must also build on the fragile political process begun over the weekend. That process must involve the search for agreement on fair and equal treatment, and adequate political representation, of all Ukrainians; on respect for Ukraine's sovereignty over its territory; and on international cooperation to rebuild Ukraine's economy.

Firm and unwavering support by the United States for these principles will be critical to the success of any negotiated outcome. The resumption of regular dialogue between Moscow and Washington will be central to the restoration of relations.

Fortunately, the arrival in Moscow of America's new ambassador, John F. Tefft, provides an opening to enhance communication and dialogue. A seasoned career diplomat with previous service in Lithuania, Georgia and Ukraine, as well as Russia, Mr. Tefft brings to Moscow a capacity to express American views and positions clearly and to listen to and explain Russian thinking to Washington. His arrival gives both governments an opportunity to rebuild relations and to move away from the present path of confrontation.

Reinvigorating American-Russian diplomacy will be challenging. The negative effects of the Ukraine crisis are part of a broader downturn in relations over the last few years. The escalation of violence in Ukraine, and rising calls among Europeans and Americans for more forceful action and tougher sanctions to confront Russian military activity, have increased the prospect for further escalation and a further downturn in bilateral relations.

Although spokesmen and leaders in Washington have suggested that Russia has an "off ramp" to extricate itself from the present situation and the United States is ready to cooperate in that effort, this uphill path is strewn with rocks and largely uncharted. Additional sanctions, increased military pressure and battlefield escalation will not, by themselves, help define a way forward.

Only the use of diplomacy can help Mr. Poroshenko take advantage of new openings to define his country's relations with its neighbors, restore Ukrainian sovereignty and effect a permanent end to the bloodshed. Sanctions and further efforts to escalate political and military pressure, and reliance on unilateral action without accompanying diplomacy, would all but assure continued suffering for the people of Ukraine.

It is time for the United States to use its diplomatic assets, including our new ambassador in Moscow, to take active leadership of diplomatic efforts to resolve the crisis over Ukraine and set American relations with Russia on a new, more productive course.

Six Attempted Terror Attacks Foiled in Jerusalem, West Bank

Israel's security forces thwarted five attempted terror attacks on Sunday, while a sixth was prevented when a civilian escaped her would-be attacker. No Israeli forces were hurt in any of the incidents, while five of the Palestinian attackers were shot dead. On Sunday night, two attackers armed with homemade M-16 rifles opened fire at a police force near the Damascus Gate in Jerusalem's Old City.

PM: Time for Some Ties w/ Arab States to Come Out of Closet

Prime Minister Benyamin Netanyahu, who speaks often about behind-the-scenes cooperation taking place between Israel and many countries in the region, hinted Sunday night that the time has come to expect that some of those contacts come out into the open. Netanyahu, speaking to the annual meeting in Jerusalem of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, said Israel and its supporters should not be shy about calling upon states around the world who want and have good relations with Israel, to change their voting patterns against Israel in international forums. Turning to the countries of the Middle East, he said there has been no place where there has been a greater shift toward Israel than in the region.

Dozens of Palestinians Injured in Clashes w/ IDF Near Ramallah

Over two-dozen Palestinians were injured Monday morning in clashes with the IDF that erupted during an arrest operation in the Al-Amari refugee camp near Ramallah. One of the soldiers was lightly injured by a stone during the clashes, when Palestinians shot at the IDF, threw explosives and stones. The army reported that about 100 Palestinians took part in the clashes, which began when Israeli soldiers entered the refugee camp and arrested two Tanzim militia members. It noted that its force opened fire at and hit 10 Palestinians in response to the rioting. According to the Palestinian Health Ministry, 28 Palestinians were injured, one of them seriously. Red Crescent teams stated that they evacuated six people who were injured as a result of live fire or rubber-coated bullets.

US Ambassador to the United Nations Samantha Power reiterated Saturday her country's commitment to advancing a two-state solution as well as a peaceful resolution for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, as she arrived in Israel for a series of high-level diplomatic talks. "[I] will meet Israeli and Palestinian leaders... to discuss US commitment to two states side by side in security and peace," Power tweeted upon her arrival.

Jordan's King: Two-State Solution Key to Defeating ISIS

A two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is vital to the defeat of the Islamic State, King Abdullah of Jordan argued Friday, saying that the decades-long dispute only served to benefit the jihadist group. "[T]he community of nations cannot talk about universal rights and global justice, but continue to deny statehood to Palestinians," he told the Munich Security Conference. "This failure has created a festering injustice, and continues to be exploited by Daesh (Islamic State) and its kind," he said. "Left unresolved, the Palestinian-Israeli conflict will become a religious conflict of a global dimension. And it is only a matter of time before we may be faced by yet another war in Gaza or in South Lebanon.

Ya'alon Meets with Jordan's King Abdullah

Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon met with Jordan's King Abdullah on the sidelines of the Munich Security Conference. The Defense Ministry said the two discussed "the bilateral ties between Jordan and Israel, the latest development in the Middle East, and the possibility of advancing the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians." The official Jordanian state news agency confirmed the meeting, but provided no further details. The fact Ya'alon's meeting with King Abdullah was made public is very unusual. While coordination meetings between government officials between the two states have been ongoing, the existence of these meetings was kept secret out of concern their publication will serve as ammunition for opposition in the kingdom to its security ties with Israel.

Bennett Calls for Palestinians to Have 'Autonomy on Steroids'

Education Minister Naftali Bennett called once again for the unilateral annexation of "Area C" in the West Bank. When asked about the war on terror, Bennett responded that he "believes the government has done a lot to combat terror." "I want to remind you that there was an incredible terror wave that hit Jerusalem and due to the government's crackdown that wave has gotten much smaller and moved out of Jerusalem and into Hebron and Gush Etzion." He continued, "we have already separated ourselves from the Palestinians, they rule themselves in their own autonomous region. My plan would be to give the Palestinians 'autonomy on steroids' in areas A and B, and to begin to annex area C in stages beginning with Gush Etzion. We need to get this started already."

Israel-EU Relations "Close, Friendly" After Bibi-Mogherini Chat

Relations between Israel and the EU were said to have returned to normal, after a conversation between Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and EU foreign policy chief Federica Mogherini. The two spoke by telephone over the weekend and appeared to resolve tensions over EU guidelines issued in November, which called for the separate consumer labeling of West Bank goods. Following Netanyahu's conversation with Mogherini, the spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry Emmanuel Nachshon said that Israel-EU relations are once more "close and friendly."

Iran? Boring. The Palestinians? Who Cares?

By Ronen Bergman

Munich – There was good news and bad news for the prime minister at this year's Munich Security Conference—the most important forum in the world for foreign relations, intelligence and security—which ended yesterday.

Let's start with the good news, at least insofar as pertains to Israeli foreign policy: the predominant atmosphere throughout entire conference was one of despair, confusion and the sense that winds of war are now blowing. This time, however, as opposed to some of the 51 pervious conferences, with the exception of a few perfunctory statements by Arab representatives at the conference, no one tried to suggest that Israel was connected to the overriding problems—ISIS, Russia's aggression in Ukraine and Syria and the refugee problem—which pose a threat to world order. Israel is only marginally relevant to any of those issues, if at all. The

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Palestinian issue was not on the agenda of even a single one of the conference's panels, and was not mentioned at all except in Defense Minister Yaalon's speech.

If the Munich Security Conference is any measure of trends in the realm of diplomacy and international relations, one can say that in 2016 the Palestinians are of no interest to anyone. The Europeans have other problems, which are far more pressing and substantive. In the new world that has evolved, it is hard to see how anyone on the continent, let alone the United States, is going to have the time, resources or desire to apply any real pressure on Israel.

The grim mood that was created by the colossal failure of European and American foreign policy vis-à-vis Russia and Syria also produced the second piece of news for Israel—the bad news. That failure created the need to highlight successes. More specifically, the one development that is perceived and was framed as a shining European and American success: the nuclear agreement with Iran. Everyone who spoke (with the exception of John McCain and Moshe Yaalon) described that agreement as a victory for dialogue over war, as a brilliant diplomatic coup by several countries that invested a huge and unprecedented effort to avert conflict—and were successful.

And that applies only to the people who showed any interest in the nuclear agreement. In the two previous conferences in Munich, Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif was the big star—an eloquent, sophisticated and affable diplomat who spoke to the West in its own language, in stark contrast to his predecessors, who were grim men who presented benighted views and denied the Holocaust. The Iranian nuclear program—against the backdrop of the crippling sanctions that were imposed on Iran, the losses incurred by Western corporations and the threat of an Israeli strike—made it the most important issue on the conference's agenda [in previous years]. The rooms in which discussions were held about the Iranian nuclear program, and first and foremost Zarif's speech, were filled to capacity. Alternatively, the panel discussion about the refugees that was held last year drew very little attendance.

This year those trends were reversed. Everything pertaining to the refugees drew a great deal of attention. Wolfgang Ischinger, chairman of the Munich Security Conference, honored Zarif by scheduling his speech for early Friday afternoon, but to no avail—the room was half-empty.

The Iranian nuclear program, which is still defined by the Israeli intelligence community as the primary threat to national security, is of no interest to the world. It's a thing of the past. Over and done with. Finished.

The lack of interest shown by the international community in the Iranian nuclear program teaches us two things. First of all, contrary to the real worry it elicits in Israel, the Munich Security Conference demonstrated that if Israel wants to clash with Iran in one way or another, it is on its own on that count. Conversations I held with senior officials from intelligence agencies in the United States and major European countries led me to understand that while they might pay lip service to the issue and say they are still concerned, in practice, given the other threats that are perceived as far more significant, the Iranian issue has been downgraded far beneath the first or second place it once held.

The second thing we can learn from the West's declining interest in the Iranian nuclear program is that the gap between the things that frighten top government officials in Jerusalem (Hizbullah, Hamas, Iran) and the concerns harbored by their counterparts in the West (Russia, ISIS and refugees) is growing larger.

Al-Monitor – February 12, 2016

Could Jerusalem Get a Palestinian Mayor?

By Mazal Mualem

"Unless we break away from the villages in East Jerusalem, our capital will become an Arab city with a Palestinian majority. But there's more. As soon as the Arabs from East Jerusalem exercise their voting rights, Jerusalem's mayor will be a Palestinian one. I would strongly advise Jews not to rely on them not ever exercising those rights." Presenting that equation in an interview with Al-Monitor, former Minister Haim Ramon will try to relay his plan to the general public in a bid to mobilize them and "save Jewish Jerusalem." This is also the name of the movement Ramon launched earlier in February together with other public figures, some with a security background. The movement's overriding objective is to apply pressure on the Israeli government to unilaterally disengage from 28 villages in East Jerusalem by amending the "Basic Law: Jerusalem, Capital of Israel," aka Jerusalem Basic Law. Among the people who support the move are retired generals Ami Ayalon, Amos Yaron and Amiram Levin as well as retired police commissioners Elik Ron and Aryeh Amit.

Despite being nonpartisan, the movement's underlying tenets express a centrist, pragmatic political outlook. It is fashioned after former Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to disengage from the Gaza Strip and northern Samaria in 2005. In other words, it seeks to do away with the Israeli-Palestinian status quo by taking unilateral action. The lone-attacker intifada, one of whose key factors are the Palestinian villages in East Jerusalem, should serve as tailwind for the movement to engage the Israeli public at large.

After a tumultuous career that started in the Labor Party and culminated in Kadima — the centrist party that had been his dream and which he co-founded — Ramon left the world of politics in 2009. Upon Kadima's establishment in November 2005, he believed that a centrist political platform could lead to a historic diplomatic arrangement resulting in the partition of the land into two states. Seeing his dream fading, he is now trying to make a difference from the outside.

The full text of the interview follows:

Al-Monitor: How is your plan supposed to save Jewish Jerusalem?

Ramon: First, we need to recall the original sin. Intoxicated by its victory at the end of the Six-Day War in 1967, Israel annexed 28 West Bank Palestinian villages that historically had never been part of Jerusalem, such as Jabel Mukaber and the Shufat refugee camp. Almost 50 years later, what we ended up with is a reality whereby out of a city of 800,000 residents, 300,000 are Palestinians. In other words, close to 40% of Jerusalem's permanent residents are Palestinians. Furthermore, in the demographics of children up to 18, 60% are Palestinians, most of whom attend the Palestinian educational system that's funded by the Israeli taxpayer. If I were to use [Prime Minister] Bibi Netanyahu's rhetoric, I would be saying that the Israeli taxpayer is funding incitement in the Palestinian Authority's [PA] schools, which includes the children of Palestinian Jerusalem. We all agree that the security reality in Jerusalem is intolerable. What we are saying is that there is a solution to this unacceptable situation.

The Jerusalem Basic Law must be amended in a way that those Palestinian villages with some 200,000 residents will be cut off from Jerusalem and be returned to their original status in the West Bank. This is where areas A and B will be formed [Area A being under Palestinian security control and Area B under Israeli security control].

Al-Monitor: Will this materialize in a unilateral move?

Ramon: Their annexation was a unilateral move too. Those people were never asked whether they wanted to be residents of East Jerusalem, and most of them never asked for it. They didn't take as much as a single act on their own to remain in Jerusalem. I'm only talking about the permanent residents that were willy-nilly [forcefully] annexed and will be returned, albeit not necessarily willy-nilly. After all, President Mahmoud Abbas demands that these villages be returned to the Palestinian state. This 1967 annexation has been adhered to by all of Israel's governments over the years. The only one who did something about it was Ariel Sharon, who set up a fence from [Palestinian West Bank village of] Kalandia to the southern part of the Shufat refugee camp. When I served in his Cabinet, I demanded that he continue building the fence. He refused to do so and told me, "Right now, I'm not going to confront the radical right," because he was busy with the disengagement from Gaza. The point is that even Sharon didn't amend the Jerusalem Basic Law and the 50,000 Palestinians he kept outside the fence continue to enjoy all the benefits that permanent residents do.

Al-Monitor: The Israeli public was sorely disappointed with disengaging from Gaza, a unilateral move. How will you convince it that this [the "save Jerusalem plan"] is the right thing to do?

Ramon: The plan we're proposing has three advantages. It improves security in the sense that there will be a fence and that the Israel Defense Forces [IDF] will be able to operate in those villages. Today, Jabel Mukaber is exactly like Tel Aviv in the sense that the IDF cannot operate there. The second aspect is demographics. From a situation of 60% Jews and 40% Palestinians, we will move to a ratio of 80% Jews and 20% Palestinians. And third, the government will be saving some 2 to 3 billion shekels [approx. $500-$750 million] that it can invest in more vital spheres. Israelis need to understand that they're financing social security benefits, full health services, as well as welfare and educational services in the villages of East Jerusalem. As minister of Jerusalem affairs, I started talking about it. It was then that I realized the extent of the absurdity. Today I understand it even more so.

Al Monitor: And how will you explain to the world such a radical move that weakens the PA and perhaps strengthens Hamas?

Ramon: I'm not throwing the residents of East Jerusalem under the bus. They will be part and parcel of the PA. Hamas? I'm not aware that it is present in [the Palestinian town of] Abu Dis. These are right-wing arguments that the radical left has adopted. Those villages will be part of the PA. Why would Hamas go there instead of Nablus? What's the difference? There will be no difference. Why is there no Hamas presence in [the Palestinian city of] al-Eizariya? Because the IDF is in control there and because of the PA. The PA will fight Hamas as it does across the West Bank, and it will find it easier to do so. You need to realize that currently the PA is unable to operate in Shufat, which has become a no-man's-land. We're not going in there because the police are afraid. The military is prohibited from going in. The PA can't go in either because it's not its territory. According to our plan, these areas will finally have a landlord.

The claim that Hamas will take over is nonsense voiced by radical right-wingers who want [Israel] to keep staying there. What I understand much less is why the radical left is opposed to the plan. On the other hand, the radical left was also opposed to the separation fence and the pullout from Gaza. Had we listened to those people, we would have been without a fence today and we would have still been controlling the Gaza Strip. I can tell you that according to the polls we conducted, our plan enjoys a large majority: 70% of the public support it. Of the 30% that are opposed to it, two-thirds are the radical right and another third is the radical left, which apparently cares about the Palestinians and is less interested in the Jews. I can also say that many Likud voters support this move. We're talking about huge numbers of supporters.

Al-Monitor: How will you explain to the public that this is not the partition of Jerusalem, as the right claims it is?

Ramon: What we're talking about is saving Jerusalem. I'm not cutting off the Temple Mount, the Old City or the Holy Basin. What embodies the true essence of Jerusalem stays that way. 100,000 Palestinians will remain in the city. I believe that the public knows what's good for it. My explanation consists of three things that the Jewish public is in favor of: It doesn't like giving money to Arabs, it wants its state to be Jewish and it wants to have security. If our plan doesn't go through, Jerusalem will become an Arab city with a Palestinian majority. Moreover, if the Palestinians stop being stupid [as they boycott the municipal elections], Jerusalem's next mayor won't be [incumbent Mayor] Nir Barkat — he will be a Palestinian. Once they decide to take part in the elections, [Jerusalem] will have a Palestinian mayor.

Al-Monitor: The chair of the Zionist Camp, Isaac "Buji" Herzog, has recently presented his plan to separate from the villages in East Jerusalem. What's the difference between his plan and yours?

Ramon: The problem is that Herzog adopted it in a warped way, because he doesn't have the guts to go the whole hog. He doesn't say that the Jerusalem Basic Law — which is the key element — needs to be changed. What he talks about is separation and a fence. He is throwing slogans into the air without elaborating. The right thing to do is to come before the Knesset tomorrow morning and propose to amend the Jerusalem Basic Law. The only positive aspect in all of this is that the Labor Party has finally started addressing diplomatic issues instead of just dealing with having more assistants in kindergartens. After two election campaigns during which they thought that by focusing on the salaries of senior officials and kindergarten assistants they would rise to power, they finally realized that they also need to tackle diplomatic topics. By contrast to them, we are an apolitical movement, so Likud supporters can join us as well. You can support a movement to save Jerusalem and still root for Bibi, and vice versa. What we're saying is that we need to do away with the status quo or else we'll lose the Jewish majority in Jerusalem, and down the line we'll lose the [Jewish] majority in the state. Our interest is to have two states or else we will first become a binational state, which will then become an Arab state.

Fueled by demographic shifts, rising doubts about the direction of the country, perceived missteps by Sen. McCain and a voter-registration push by the Obama campaign that has helped add a net of 310,000 new, mostly younger voters, the Democratic ticket increasingly appears positioned to win Virginia and make critical inroads across the South. A CNN/Time Inc. poll released Wednesday shows Sen. Obama has opened a nine-point lead on Sen. McCain in Virginia.

most of the afternoon, McCain headed downstairs to his Virginia Victory offices to rally a group of volunteers who had been making phone calls on his behalf.

He referenced recent poll numbers and the state of the race in Virginia before telling his supporters that this news should only make them want to work harder.

"After I whip his you know what in this debate, we're going to be going out 24/7," McCain said of his upcoming debate with Obama, but seeming to consider recent criticism that his words have been too inflammatory, he quickly told supporters to be respectful.

No New Economic Proposal Expected From McCain (NYT 10/13/08)

WASHINGTON — Despite signals that Senator John McCain would have new prescriptions for the economic crisis after a weekend of meetings, his campaign said Sunday that Mr. McCain, the Republican presidential nominee, would not have any more proposals this week unless developments call for some.

Ferry's involvement in Ukraine is significant because Davis has tried to distance himself from his shop's work there since he joined the campaign. A McCain spokesman told ABC News early this year that Davis wasn't involved in the Ukraine elections. Manafort reportedly led the firm's work there, but a source familiar with the effort says that Ferry "was going back and forth."

How much can Crist do to help McCain? (Gainesville Sun 10/11/08)

By JOE FOLLICK

Senate Democratic leader Steve Geller, D-Hallandale Beach, is a longtime friend of Crist's. Geller said McCain would win Florida had McCain tapped Crist as running mate.

"I do believe that Charlie would have been probably enough to take Florida off the table," he said. "I believe that Obama will carry Florida by three or four points, and I believe that Charlie could have picked up five to 10."

But without Crist on the ticket, Geller said the governor can do "nothing" to help McCain.

A Candidate Who Embraces Opposites (NYT 10/12/08)

By MICHAEL COOPER

At the presidential debate in Nashville last Tuesday, Senator John McCain made his case for fiscally conservative, smaller government, calling for an "across the board" spending freeze and denouncing what he described as Senator Barack Obama's "government will do this and government will do that" approach to health care.
But Mr. McCain's big proposal that night was to spend $300 billion in taxpayer money to buy bad mortgages from banks and refinance them, a plan conservatives quickly condemned as an expensive effort to nationalize the mortgage industry.

McCain shies away from recent days' attacks (AP 10/11/08)
By PHILIP ELLIOTT
DAVENPORT, Iowa (AP) -- Republican John McCain, the clock ticking down on a chance to narrow Democrat Barack Obama's lead in polls, turned away Saturday from visceral attacks on his rival to pivot back toward policy differences.
McCain kept his speech in this Iowa river town focused on the economy and other policies, a striking change from just days ago when his campaign redoubled its challenge to Obama over his association with a former '60s radical. McCain also claimed that American voters didn't really know Obama and his own "radical" views.

Come one come all: Alaska media darling Palin cultivated national press in pre-McCain days (AP 10/13/08)

GOP vice presidential nominee Sarah Palin is keeping reporters at arms' length in her campaign, but she had a very different approach as Alaska's new governor: She couldn't get enough of them.
Palin cultivated interviews with local and national journalists and welcomed them from as far away as London, earning time in the spotlight even before Republican presidential candidate John McCain selected her as his running mate.

But progress isn't a pipeline. Palin is padding her resume when she says we're "building" a pipeline. There's no pipe, no final permits, no financing, no shipping agreements. There is investment and prep work in the tens of millions, with the potential for more than $1 billion, including $500 million for TransCanada. The wisdom of Palin's strategy has yet to be proven in pipe… Palin won't be invited to a conference of international oil consultants. She wouldn't belong there.

For president, a generational conflict (LA Times 10/13/08)
By Russell Baker
The two men competing for the unenviable job of trying to reverse this decline present a classic conflict of generations. Barack Obama is 47 years old; John McCain is 72, old enough to be Obama's father. This unusual age spread between presidential candidates brings to mind a wide variety of familiar literary plots about father-and-son conflicts.

The NRA two-step: Once, it attacked McCain. Now, it's backing him. (LA Times 10/13/08)
Editroial
The NRA on Thursday officially endorsed John McCain, though that was merely a formality given that it had already spent $2.3 million on attack ads targeting Obama. This puts the organization in the odd position of throwing its considerable political clout behind a Republican candidate whom its official journal once called "one of the premier flag carriers for enemies of the 2nd Amendment," and against a Democrat who never tires of telling voters that he believes in the right to bear arms. So what gives? Apparently, the NRA thinks that McCain's past legislative sins against gun ownership are forgivable, while Obama's are not.

Fire the Campaign (NYT 10/13/08)
By WILLIAM KRISTOL
He has nothing to lose. His campaign is totally overmatched by Obama's. The Obama team is well organized, flush with resources, and the candidate and the campaign are in sync. The McCain campaign, once merely problematic, is now close to being out-and-out dysfunctional. Its combination of strategic incoherence and operational incompetence has become toxic. Obama can hardly be held accountable for Ayers's behavior 40 years ago, but at least McCain and Palin can try to take some responsibility for the behavior of their own supporters in 2008. What's troubling here is not only the candidates' loose inflammatory talk but also their refusal to step in promptly and strongly when someone responds to it with bloodthirsty threats in a crowded arena. Joe Biden had it exactly right when he expressed concern last week that "a leading American politician who might be vice president of the United States would not just stop midsentence and turn and condemn that." Crossing Over: As the U.S. Economy Sputters, Working-Class Women Shift to Obama (WSJ 10/11/08)
By JONATHAN KAUFMAN
Working-class women, generally defined as those in blue-collar and service jobs earning less than $50,000 a year -- comprise almost a quarter of American voters. Sen. Obama trailed Sen. John McCain by 12 points among these women just two weeks ago, but has since closed the gap. According to a Wall Street Journal poll conducted the weekend of Oct. 4, the two senators are now running even, with 45% of such voters giving each candidate the nod. The reversal is one of the main reasons Sen. Obama is gaining ground in swing states like Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, North Carolina and Indiana -- all of which have large rural and blue-collar populations.

Senator Bob Menendez Champions US Senate Passage of Greek Independence Day Resolution

WASHINGTON, DC, March 27, 2015 -- Early this morning the United States Senate passed by unanimous consent a resolution highlighting the many bonds between the US and Greece and celebrating the 194th anniversary of the independence of Greece. This is the 30th consecutive year that such legislation has passed the US Senate.

The former Chairman of and current Ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and long-time advocate of Hellenic and Orthodox causes, Senator Bob Menendez (D-NJ), authored this bill (Senate Resolution 105), secured over 1/4 of the US Senate as co-sponsors or co-authors, and secured its passage.

On March 25, Senator Dan Coats (R-IN) stopped the US Senate from passing this resolution on Greek Independence Day, in objection to statements made by the Greek Defense Minister. That hold was released by Senator Coats yesterday afternoon.

"We thank Ranking Member Menendez and the lead Republican co-sponsor, Senator John Barrasso (R-WY), as well as the other Senators who co-sponsored this legislation," said Andrew Manatos, President of CEH. The full list of 29 Senators who co-sponsored is below.

This resolution notes, among other things, that:

- "The founding fathers of the United States, many of whom read Greek political philosophy in the original Greek language, drew heavily on the political experience and philosophy of ancient Greece in forming the representative democracy of the United States"
- "Petros Mavromichalis, the former Commander in Chief of Greece and a founder of the modern Greek state, said to the citizens of the United States in 1821, `It is in your land that liberty has fixed her abode and . . . in imitating you, we shall imitate our ancestors and be thought worthy of them if we succeed in resembling you.'"
- "The Greek national anthem, the "Hymn to Liberty", includes the words, "most heartily was gladdened George Washington's brave land."
- "Greece, in one of the most consequential `David vs. Goliath' victories for freedom and democracy in modern times, refused to surrender to the Axis forces and inflicted a fatal wound at a crucial moment in World War II, forcing Adolf Hitler to change his timeline and delaying the attack on Russia, where the Axis forces met defeat... Winston Churchill said, `if there had not been the virtue and courage of the Greeks, we do not know which the outcome of World War II would have been' and 'no longer will we say that Greeks fight like heroes, but that heroes fight like Greeks;'"

- "Throughout the 20th century, Greece was one of a few countries that allied with the United States in every major international conflict."
- "Greece, located in a region where Christianity meets Islam and Judaism, maintains excellent relations with Muslim countries and Israel... has taken important steps in recent years to further cross-cultural understanding, rapprochement, and cooperation in various fields with Turkey and has also improved its relations with other countries in the region, including Israel, thus enhancing the stability of the wider region."
- "The governments and people of Greece and the United States are at the forefront of efforts to advance freedom, democracy, peace, stability, and human rights ... those efforts and similar ideals have forged a close bond between the people of Greece and the United States."

Given this morning's am shows - which were terrible - that is no longer a great argument.

Subject:	Call TPs from climate team
Attachments:	15.07.25 Call Sheet talking points(11pm).docx

Hi John-

TPs for tomorrow's calls attached and in plain text from the climate team. They'll let us know if these see any updates before tomorrow afternoon.

Thanks!
Milia

Post-Video Release Climate Announcement Call Sheet Talking Points:

• I wanted to talk to you directly because Hillary has made a major announcement on how as President she will fight climate change and dramatically accelerate our progress toward a clean energy economy.

• I won't be able to top on this call the powerful video of her describing how important it is to her personally that our county rises to the climate challenge. Once you see it, you'll have no doubt about that.

• But I do want to talk to you about the goals themselves and how she will achieve them as president.

• The first goal is that the United States will have more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of Hillary's first term.

o That is the equivalent of having rooftop solar systems on over 25 million homes.

o It would expand the amount of installed solar capacity to 140 gigawatts— a 700% increase from current level.

• The second goal is that the United States will generate enough clean renewable energy to power every home in America within 10 years of Hillary taking office, or 2027.

o This means 33 percent of all U.S electricity will come from renewable energy by the beginning of 2027.

o To put that in context, the Clean Power Plan as proposed would only get us to 25% renewable electricity by that time, and it exceeds the 2030 renewable energy goal that President Obama announced earlier this year.

• Together, these goals will add more power generation capacity to the grid than during any decade in our history, from a combination of wind, solar, hydro, geothermal and other forms of renewable electricity.

• Significantly, these are not long term or purely aspirational goals. The next decade is decisive if we are to get on the right trajectory to deep decarbonization, so these are goals designed to be worked toward starting on Day 1.

• What does that entail?
• Hillary will first fight to defend and implement the Clean Power Plan and the other important standards that this President put in place or set in motion.

• But these standards will set the floor, not the ceiling.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

• To go further she will launch a Clean Energy Challenge that, among other things, will provide competitive grants to empower states to exceed federal carbon pollution standards, reward communities that remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and make our electrical grid more reliable and resilient.

• She will ensure that every part of the federal government is working in concert to drive renewable deployment, such as through extending tax incentives.

• This is just the beginning of the energy and climate strategy that Hillary will present over the coming months, including ways in which the Clean Energy Challenge will improve the efficiency of our buildings and modernize our transportation system, as well as major initiatives in energy and climate security, modernizing North American infrastructure, and providing economic opportunity and retirement security for coalfield workers and their families.

• She is excited about getting to work on these goals, and that of course will mean working closely with climate and clean energy leaders who make it all possible.

• We hope you will help us spread the word about them, and work with us to make them a reality.

• Thank you and I am more than happy to answer any questions.

Additional background on Clean Energy Challenge:

She will outline this Challenge in detail in the coming weeks, and it will include:

1) Climate Action Competition: Competitive grants and other market-based incentives to empower states to exceed federal carbon pollution standards and accelerate clean energy deployment.

2) Solar X-Prize: Awards for communities that successfully cut the red tape that slows rooftop solar installation times and increases costs for businesses and consumers.

3) Transforming the Grid: Work with states, cities and rural communities to strengthen grid reliability and resilience, increase consumer choice and improve customer value.

4) Rural Leadership: Expand the Rural Utilities Service and other successful USDA programs to help provide clean, reliable, and affordable energy, not just to rural Americans but to the rest of the country as well.

As part of the Clean Energy Challenge, Hillary will ensure that every part of the federal government is working in concert to help Americans build a clean energy future. This includes:

1) Transmission Investment: Ensure the federal government is a partner, not an obstacle, in getting low-cost wind and other renewable energy to market.

2) Solar Access: Overcome barriers that prevent low-income and other households from using solar energy to reduce their monthly energy bills.

3) Tax Incentives: Fight to extend federal clean energy incentives and make them more cost effective both for taxpayers and clean energy producers.

4) Public Lands and Infrastructure: Expand renewable energy on public lands, federal buildings, and federally-funded infrastructure, including an initiative to significantly increase hydropower generation from existing dams across the US.

5) Innovation: Increase public investment in clean energy R&D, including in storage technology, designed materials, advanced nuclear, and carbon capture and sequestration. Expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, and cut those that fail to deliver results.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 08/11/08

Main Topics: McCain and Bush on Russia

Summary of Shift: The little political coverage wedged between Olympic segments focused on McCain and Obama's reaction to the conflict between Georgia and Russia. The Obama campaign vowed to announce Barack's running mate over text message. Tom Ridge appeared on "Hardball" and discussed the need to punish Russia. The John Edwards scandal still remains to take up a large percentage of political coverage.

In other news, the Olympics have stirred a renewed media fascination with China and its improving but still rigid censorship. Oil prices continue to fall but heating oil prices are now a concern.

Highlights:

1. CNN: George Bush advocates cease in violence, return to status quo in Georgia
2. CNN: McCain Georgian lobbyist ties helpful in race, judgment on issue
3. MSNBC: Tom Ridge: John McCain is better equipped to deal with Russia
4. MSNBC: Olbermann on the one term rumor and McCain's lost phone privileges

George Bush Gives Statement Advocate Cease In Violence, Return To Status Quo In Georgia (CNN 08/11/08 5:20pm)

GEORGE BUSH: I just met with my national security team to discuss the situation in Georgia.

I am deeply concerned by reports that Russian troops have moved beyond the zone of conflict, attacked the Georgian town of Gori, and are threatening the Georgia's -- Georgia's capital of Tbilisi. There's evidence that Russian forces may soon begin bombing the civilian airport in the capital city.

If these reports are accurate, these Russian actions would represent a dramatic and brutal escalation of the conflict in Georgia. And these actions would be inconsistent with assurances we have received from Russia that its objectives were limited to restoring the status quo in South Ossetia that existed before fighting began on August the 6th.

It now appears that an effort may be underway to depose Russia's* duly elected government. Russia has invaded a sovereign neighboring state and threatens a democratic government elected by its people. Such an action is unacceptable in the 21st century.

The Georgian government has accepted the elements of a peace agreement that the Russian government previously said it would be willing to accept: an immediate cease-fire, the withdrawal of forces from the zone of conflict, a return to the military status quo as of August 6th, and a commitment to refrain from using force. There are representatives of the European Union and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe currently in Moscow seeking Russia's agreement to this peace plan.

Russia's government must respect Georgia's territorial integrity and sovereignty. The Russian government must reverse the course it appears to be on, and accept this peace agreement as a first step toward resolving this conflict.

Russia's actions this week have raised serious questions about its intentions in Georgia and the region. These actions have substantially damaged Russia's standing in the world. And these actions jeopardize Russians' relations -- Russia's relations with the United States and Europe. It is time for Russia to be true to its word and to act to end this crisis.

McCain Georgian Lobbyist Ties Helpful In Race, Judgment On Issue (CNN 08/11/08 8:04pm)

ERRON LOUIS: The old issue that's been dogging the McCain campaign, his connection with lobbyists, I think sort of pokes its head up here. He's got a top staffer who's been on the payroll of the Georgian government for a long, long time and you know it may not lead him in a wrong direction but the fact that you've got influence there.

LOU DOBBS: And is it interesting that Senator Obama has been far more constrained in his rhetoric at least?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

LOUIS: Oh indeed. Well, that's right. And frankly, McCain was Johnny on the spot because he's got an inside connection to the Georgian government.
DOBBS: And there in the conundrum. Those lobbyists with influence and sometimes knowledge that is helpful. At least to candidates, not to government, had to throw that in.

Tom Ridge: John McCain is Better Equipped to Deal with Russia (MSNBC 08/10/08 07:36pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Is Pennsylvania one of the states if John McCain wins it, you have won the whole ball game?

TOM RIDGE: I think, without a doubt, that's absolutely certain. No equivocation of that one. If we win Pennsylvania, we win it all.

MATTHEWS: […] Is that what you think, that Barack Obama is not fundamentally American?

RIDGE: I think he is fundamentally unprepared. I think he's fundamentally an American. […]

MATTHEWS: Why are the Clinton people going back over the old fight?
RIDGE: Well it's interesting. There are a series of questions I'm prepared to answer but unfortunately I'm not prepared to answer those. […] While they continue to have their own little interparty feud, John's been campaigning hard, been campaigning aggressively and drawing distinctions between his approach to America's future and Senator Obama's. Senator Obama is very conveniently on vacation. This is a grueling, grueling test of stamina for both candidates. John is talking about the distinction on tax policy, energy policy and frankly the recent events of with the Russia invasion on Georgia, remind everyone what a perilous time we live in in the 21st century. Which I think gives even greater credence to Senator McCain's insistence and his profile that he be far better prepared to be commander in chief."

MATTHEWS: Why would a prochoice democratic woman who voted for Hillary Clinton vote for McCain? […]

RIDGE: […] If there is a wider range of issues, from heath care, the environment to energy policy that also drives them to support Senator McCain. […]

MATTHEWS: Do you think John McCain is getting too militant in terms of his attitude towards Russia? You mentioned a moment ago the Russian invasion of Georgia, it's neighboring Republic and former member of the Soviet Union. Do you think calling for Russia to be kicked out of the g-8 is too strong of language at this point with our relations with Russia?

RIDGE: Well Chris, we've had some interesting conversations in the last few days about that. And John, one of the real challenges we have in the 21st century is holding a country, like Russia, that's now invaded an emerging democracy that's had free elections. How do you hold them accountable? What are the consequences? They want to be part of the civilized community, the world global marketplace. And with gasoline prices going through the roof, their economy is very robust. But there are some responsibilities if you want to engage with the rest of the world. The notion that until they are more accountable to the rules that civilized countries play by, be they military, diplomatic, or economic, I don't think it's necessarily being combative to suggest unless their conduct complies with a certain norm, there has to be consequences. Whether it's that or something else, that is left to be seen. But, there has to be consequences in this world. And right now, we look at Russia invading a neighboring country, it appears without, to this day, no consequences yet.

MATTHEWS: Speaking of consequences, what would be the reaction of Russia, if we get tough with them, and then we go back to them and say help us in trying to denuclearize, or prevent Iran from getting nuclear weapons. If we're tough on them on this issue of Georgia, don't we sacrifice our leverage with them in terms of getting them as an ally against a nuclear Iran? Isn't that one of the trade off we have to deal with if we get tough with them?

RIDGE: It's a very complicated world. There's certainly no easy answer. At some point and time, the western world, and the democracies, must say to Russia, you have invaded an emerging democracy, they had free elections. We know your not comfortable with them on the border but it certainly didn't justify invading a peaceful neighbor. At the end of the day, I think the greatest challenge is providing for the common defense and dealing with people like Putin who right now is pretty much immune to world opinion. How we hold him accountable, that's one suggestion, that John's made and I suspect, when he's elected president, there will be others.

Olbermann on The One Term Rumor and McCain's lost Cell Phone Privileges (MSNBC 08/11/08 08:21pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: The rumor has been echoed since spring, John McCain's ace in the hole, […] he would announce if he was elected he would not serve more than one term. The Senator himself had killed the thing off months ago when he himself said any President elected under such a pledge would be an instantaneous lame duck. […] Why then is McCain's campaign manager playing all cute and coy about the prospect?

OLBERMANN: Plus the nugget about McCain's phone privileges being restricted, like some teenager. The New York Times reporting that Senator McCain has spent so much time calling people for advice on his cell phone and then adopting the last position he heard that his senior campaign staff is cutting down on his use of his own cell phone and limiting the number of people he can talk to. All part of a strategy to stop Senator McCain from changing campaign policy on the fly, keeping him on message. The message right now, distance from the current administration. Senator McCain telling employees at a GE Plant in Eerie, Pennsylvania that his campaign is about restoration.

{Clip of McCain]
JOHN MCCAIN: I could give you a laundry list of the things we have to address. But I think that's all got to be associated with one fundamental mission, and restore trust and confidence in government. Therefore inspire confidence in America again.

OLBERMANN: Senator McCain neglecting to mention the obvious corollary here that if trust and confidence in the government has to be restored, than it must have been President Bush's administration who lost it. […] Why the mixed message here from the McCain campaign on term length. […] Was Rick Davis really just hyping it just to get people to tune in to coverage of the convention?

EUGENE ROBINSON: Well that's what it sounded like to me Keith. […] It makes no sense for McCain to make such a pledge. He would become a lame duck, it's tandem to saying vote for me, you might not like me very much but you'll only have me for four years. It draws attention to his age. [..] It sounded like Rick Davis was saying no really, there will be exciting and interesting things at the Republican convention. Please, please tune in.

OLBERMANN: The New York Times story, keep him off the phone, don't let him talk to people, he's going off message like when he took the wind out of the tire pressure swipe at Obama. […] The candidate does not speak for the campaign?

ROBINSON: […] He goes off message all the time. John McCain on message is not really John McCain. And you can kind of tell from that clip we just played of him doing the restore confidence kind of message and he doesn't sound naturalistic. It's more kind of automaton like when he tries to stay on message. And he's liable to pick up that cell phone and start talking to somebody ad then change his mind without letting anyone on the campaign know.

OLBERMANN: […] Perhaps he should have done this before he went out on the restoration and trust and confidence in the government thing, given that his policies are the same as the administration that lost all those, and his party is the same. Aren't some people going to see the disconnect there?

ROBINSON: Well of course it is this line he's trying to walk. […] How can he disown the Bush years without disowning the Republican Party, without losing the base? […]

Subject: [big campaign] General McCaffrey calls for "A new approach to Cuba"

Friends - As many of you already know, I am currently serving as General Consultant for the Freedom to Travel Campaign , a very impressive non-profit coalition that aims to lift the U.S. citizen ban on travel to Cuba.

With our encouragement, McClatchy jumped on this ed piece from 4-star Gen. Barry McCaffrey and has so far (as I have been able to find) gotten ink in the Miami Herald , Bellingham Herald & Cleveland Plain Dealer... hopefully more to come.

There's some spicy language in there that I think you will like.

If you need any back info on this, or ever need info Cuba in general, just say the word.

A new approach to Cuba

BY BARRY R. MCCAFFREY

www.mccaffreyassociates.com

ARLINGTON, Va. -- The Obama administration has made an excellent first step to eliminate some restrictions on travel to the island, to loosen constraints on remittances and to re-engage in migration talks. Positive, multiple lines of engagement are clearly the way forward. Broader contact and leverage with Cuba through additional commercial and people-to-people contacts will in time help promote a more pluralistic, less impoverished, and more open society.

While President Obama's incremental changes in policy toward Cuba are positive, they are also insufficient. Now is the time for decisive and rational efforts to bring Cuba back into full engagement with the economic and political dynamics of the Americas.

For starters, we're still a lot closer to the status quo than to the decisive break from past policies, which is where we need to be. The status quo is a loser. The long-term U.S. government policy of isolating the Castro regime has failed to bring about either democracy or regime change. Cuba has broken out of the box and created well-established diplomatic and economic relations with a range of international partners -- China, Russia, Mexico, Brazil, and members of the European Union. The Castro regime has successfully survived multiple economic and natural disasters (e.g. ending of Soviet economic support) at significant cost to its people.

Second, there are both economic and security incentives for moving forward. The Cuban state has been unable to meet the economic and democratic aspirations of the Cuban people. Cuba must double their economy within the coming decade. Its ability to do so, always doubtful given the regimented dullness of that Marxist state, is in greater question now, lashed as its economy has been by last year's horrendous storms and the continued battering of the global financial crisis. The hard-liners here who are counseling that we tighten the noose now in hopes that we'll break the regimes back would allow average Cubans to suffer mightily, put our security interests at risk with a massive boatlift, and turn the rest of the region against us for decades. Strangulation is no solution.

Political transitions from authoritarian to democratic regimes have successfully occurred in Latin America and Eastern Europe following decades of dictatorship. The poor Cubans will almost have to start from scratch in building the political institutions that are essential to good governance and participative policy making.
~~~~~~~~~~

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Continuation of ineffective and punitive U.S. diplomatic and economic policies will not accelerate political transition on the island. In fact, this failed strategy of political isolation is used by the Castro Regime as a rallying point. The United States has become the raison d'etre of this regime's continued defense of its failed experiment with a directed, authoritarian, socialist state.

It's time for a realistic policy shift on Cuba. In my judgment, Congress and the administration should move to:

• Remove Cuba from the State Department list of State Sponsors of Terrorism. The poverty of ideas and resources forced the Cuban government to end its ineffective support of revolutionary movements long ago.

• Repeal enforcement of the "Helms-Burton" legislation. Both Presidents George W. Bush and Bill Clinton signed provisions allowing for waivers of the outmoded law's provision.

• End the economic embargo on Cuba. Market forces should determine the level of trade between our nations.

• End U.S. restrictions on travel by American citizens to Cuba. There are no similar restrictions to other non-democratic nations, including North Korea.

• Close the detention facility at Guantanamo and return the base to Cuban sovereignty. The place has become an international embarrassment to us.

• End the "Wet Foot/Dry Foot immigration policy" and treat illegal immigrants from Cuba as we do those from Mexico or any other country.

• Formalize coordination on anti-drug trafficking matters with Cuba's law enforcement and security forces.

• Provide significantly increased funds to the U.S. Agency for International Development so that we can support economic development as democratic political transition inevitably occurs in Cuba.

• End U.S. opposition to Cuban participation in the Western Hemisphere multilateral fora (lifting Cuba's suspension from the OAS was a good start) because diplomacy and engagement, not shunning, will open Cuba to liberal political ideals.

We should not doubt that there will be an eventual political transition in Cuba. Change is now inevitable as Castro edges off the stage of history. The critical issue for the United States is whether we are going to be a constructive guiding agent in this process of change.

The United States has enormous power to unilaterally change policy toward Cuba and shape the agenda of change. We do not have to negotiate with the Cuban government to modify the ways we deal with illegal migrants from the island. Modifying punitive economic and travel policies should not be viewed as making concessions to an authoritarian regime. Instead, they should be viewed as a belated recognition that our past policies were ineffective and will not promote democratization in Cuba. Obama is uniquely positioned to take these decisive steps and he should do so.

Barry R. McCaffrey is a retired Army general and an adjunct professor of international affairs at West Point; he served as U.S. drug czar from 1996 to 2001.

Main Topics: McCain's Remarks, Oil and Drilling, McCain Ads

Summary of Shift: The USS Houston appears to have a problem; the US Navy may have been sailing ships around the world with nuclear power plants for sixty years without an accident but that record is showing some leaks.
The already heated exchange between the candidates on drilling and energy picks up more steam and a spot on center stage today. Obama releases new ads and with a novelty handout to reporters the reaction from the McCain camp is not difficult to gauge. Discussion on McCain's last series of ads shows no signs of abatement.

Highlights:

1. CNN: McCain's remarks to the National Label Company
2. MSNBC: Alter: McCain's way to win "is to try to turn Obama into an uppity and vaguely foreign presence
3. Drilling and Energy
   a. ABC: Campaigns trade barbs on drilling
   b. CBS: CBS Evening News covers back and forth on oil
4. FNC: Bounds impugns Obama's "Celebrity" and energy plan

Highlights, No Clips:

5. NBC - BRIAN WILLIAMS: [Oil prices are down] as both presidential candidates were focused on energy today . . . John McCain today criticized Obama for his opposition to nuclear power and plans to underscore that point with a visit to a nuclear plant in Michigan tomorrow.
6. MSNBC - ROGER SIMON: For a guy who is supposed to have such a famous temper, McCain doesn't really like attacking . . . I think he is often uncomfortable with his own campaign. The Britney and Paris ad, I think will go down in history as visually incoherent., at the end it made McCain . . . look like a grumpy old man.
7. MSNBC - DEL WALTERS: If you're John McCain, the fact that we're talking about race right now is exactly what he wants. If you're John Q. Americanpublic, what you want to hear is which one of these two people will make it more affordable for me to fill up my gas tank, hold on to my house or balance my checkbook.
8. MSNBC - RACHAEL MADDOW: It's a political victory for the Republican Party generally, John McCain specifically on this. That the whole idea of high gas prices has now become a debate on whether or not to drill and drilling would really have no impact on gas prices for, I don't know, a generation, if then.
9. MSNBC: Faiz Shakir weighs in on drilling

McCain's Remarks to the National Label Company (08/04/08 1:37pm)
JOHN MCCAIN: We're going to solve the energy crisis that's affecting businesses like National Label Company. And we need an all of the above approach. We need to aggressively develop alternative energies like wind, solar, tide, biofuels, and geothermal, but we also need to expand our use of existing energy resources here at home. That means we need more nuclear power. It means we need clean coal technology. And that means we need to offshore drill for oil and natural gas -- we need to drill here and we need to drill now. And anybody who says we can achieve energy independence without using and increasing these existing energy resources either doesn't have the experience to understand the challenge we face or isn't giving the American people some straight talk. Unfortunately, Senator Obama continues to oppose offshore drilling. He continues to oppose the use of nuclear power. These misguided policies would result in higher energy costs to American families and businesses and increased dependence on foreign oil. We're not going to achieve energy independence by inflating our tires. I'm going to lead our country to energy independence and I'm going to do it with a realistic, comprehensive, all of the above approach that uses every resource available to finally solve this crises. As a lot of Americans know, the Congress, doing nothing, decided to go on a five week recess without addressing the energy challenge that's affecting Americans every single day in their ability to go to work , in their ability to do their jobs, and their ability to keep inflation down as they're trying to do here at the National Label Company and they need a Congress that will act. Congress should come back into session. Congress should come back into session and I'm willing to come off the campaign trail. I call on Senator Obama to call on Congress to come back into town and come back to work, come off their recess, come off their vacation, and address this energy challenge to American and don't leave until we do. Republican and Democrat joining together . And a very vital part of that is nuclear power and another vital part of that is offshore drilling. We have to drill here and drill now. Not wait and see if there's areas to explore, not wait and see whether there's a package that needs to be put together, but drill here and drill now. Let's do- start working for the American people and not for ourselves. So, I hope that Senator Obama will call on Congress and the leaders Harry Reid and Speaker Pelosi, call Congress back into session, let's get this energy crises solved as Americans have been able to solve every challenge that's faced us and move forward and work for America and put America first. Thank you very much.

Alter: McCain's Way to Win "Is to Try to Turn Obama into an Uppity and Vaguely Foreign Presence" (MSNBC 08/04/08 11:28am)
TAMRON HALL: And back to politics, John McCain has promised not to run a negative presidential campaign and that's why some are scratching their heads at videos like this one.

["The One" ad plays]

HALL: Now, compare that ad with the Britney Spears/Paris Hilton thing and some journalists are asking whether these new attack ads are the new John McCain . . . is this the real McCain?

JONATHAN ALTER: There are a lot of people, including the guy who ran his campaign in the year 2000, John Weaver, . . . who believe that the real McCain is not a candidate who would stoop to doing these ads. Even his mother, McCain's mother, called stupid.

HALL: So then why are we seeing these ads Jon?

ALTER: Because they're like chum in the water for us pirhanas. I mean, what are we doing, we're airing them on television. They're not actually even buying . . . these spots, they're just depending on all of us on cable to air them and disseminate them . . . they're efforts to try to change the subject from the issues . . . now that's totally legit in politics . . . the question though is whether it really is kind of befitting a presidential candidate to do these dopey sorts of ads.

HALL: Well, we've seen worse in presidential races in the past.

ALTER: We may not have seen it as dopey.

HALL: . . . with John McCain, he, he last week said he was OK with the ads. I know it's chum for us in cable news but he did not come out and say, 'OK, on second thought, it wasn't me. This wasn't something I will do again.' So, 'OK, sure, yeah, I'll do it again.

ALTER: This is his way to win, is to try to turn Obama into an uppity and vaguely foreign presence, who is out of touch with Americans. To try to turn him into some kind of a snob. Which, for a guy who was on food stamps when he was a kid and worked as a community organizer in Chicago is quite a trick . . . the problem that the old McCainiacs have, the ones that were forced out, and admittedly they are maybe a little bit bitter . . . they have a lot of affection still for John McCain and they want him to get back to the original brand. Which was the maverick reformer. Instead of playing out of Karl Rove's playbook, they want him to go out and play out of John McCain's playbook. They think that would be more authentic for him . . . there's a strong argument on the other side that . . . if you're going to be in politics you have to be very tough and if he's going to win, he has to destroy Barack Obama . . .

CHARLIE GIBSON: Energy. It is the issue that comes to mind every time you pull up to the gas pump or pay a utility bill. Today, it was the issue for the presidential candidates as they argued over strategies and exchanged pointed attacks . . .

JAKE TAPPER: . . . Barack Obama today attacked John McCain as, quote, "being in the pocket of big oil"

TAPPER: . . . the McCain camp says Obama's proposals are not serious.

JOHN MCCAIN: We have to drill here and drill now. We are not going to achieve energy independence by inflating our tires.

TAPPER: That's a reference to comments Obama made last week when a voter asked him what she could do individually to conserve energy . . .

TAPPER: . . . McCain's campaign mocked the idea today, handing out tire gauges to reporters and offering them to donors who contribute $25 dollars. So why is McCain mocking something that would bring energy savings? Well, probably for the same reason that Sen. Obama is accusing McCain of offering $4 billion dollars in tax breaks to oil companies when in fact what McCain is proposing is an overall corporate tax reduction. Both sides are looking for any advantage and sometimes these attacks are not really honest.

CBS Covers the Back and Forth on Oil (CBS 08/04/08 6:35pm)

DEAN REYNOLDS: With the high price of gasoline looming over the electoral landscape, candidates are being squeezed for solutions.

REYNOLDS: Republicans were quick to ridicule [Obama's] idea, handing out tire gauges labeled "Obama's Energy Plan."

JOHN MCCAIN: We're not going to achieve energy independence by inflating our tires.

REYNOLDS: Like Obama, McCin once opposed offshore oil drilling but switched a few weeks ago and a short time later received more than $1,000,000 in campaign donations from the oil and gas industries as a new Obama ad notes.

REYNOLDS: In July, McCain said it would take a couple of years to see results from the drilling but now he says oilmen tell him it would be much sooner.

MCCAIN: The fact is that we can, using existing facilities, expand our oil production within months, according to these executives.

REYNOLDS: But that's too optimistic according to the Department of Energy which says it will take nearly a decade to get results from new drilling. McCain also said there's been no progress on energy for nearly thirty years and he assailed the Democratic congress for recessing this summer, of all summers, without a bill.

MCCAIN: I call on Senator Obama to call on congress to come back into town and come back to work.

REYNOLDS: To which Obama responded, McCain has been in congress for 26 of those 30 years that he finds so unproductive.

Bounds Impugns Obama's "Celebrity" and Energy Plan (FNC 08/04/08 5:05pm)
HEATHER NAUERT: Tucker, thanks for joining us. You just heard Frederick Pena . . . one of the things he said is that he didn't want to tap the strategic petroleum reserve but wanted to take some oil out and swap it for something else. What is your reaction to that?

TUCKER BOUNDS: . . . our reaction is a typical one. To be honest, 24 days ago when gas cost $4.11 . . . Barack Obama said he would only tap those reserves in case of [makes finger quotes] a genuine emergency [end finger quotes]. And our feeling is that his slipping in the polls 9 points over the course of one week is just the sort of [finger quotes] genuine emergency [end finger quotes] that swings him into action. But the truth is he that he is looks for any excuse out there not to propose and support additional offshore drilling that Americans universally or largely agree with that we need to pursue.

NAUERT: But he did said right there he would be willing to take a look at what the bipartisan group and the senate is doing, five Republicans and five members of the Democrats who are looking at doing something more comprehensive and bipartisan approach. What about that?

BOUNDS: Well, Heather, what he's talking about doing is supporting a compromise, and he hasn't even gone to a full-throated endorsement of that, to my knowledge. He still opposes offshore drilling. If he supported it, he would call on his Democratic leadership in congress, and tell them to move forward with a proposal. These are people that are in his party that he leads and he's not doing that. The truth is is that he doesn't-- does not support offshore drilling. He said as much Saturday. He didn't say that he supported it today. He has got all sorts of caveats and the American people don't need caveats. They need action. Gas is running at a price that is hurting American families and John McCain's the one that's going to make the change.

NAUERT: Let me ask you about that action. John McCain has been saying that he wants to stop campaigning and suggest that he and Barack Obama head to Capitol Hill and do something during this August recess. Has McCain or have you picked up the phone to Obama's spokesman and said hey, let's together stop campaigning this August, let's head to Washington and do something to resolve this gas issue?

BOUNDS: You know, it is a good thing. I think people do want their leaders in Washington to actually make changes, which is why John McCain is running for president. We haven't called the Obama campaign, to my knowledge. We may have. I can tell you when we proposed ten town hall meetings . . . they were opposed to that. It seems that John McCain's worldwide celebrity doesn't match up to Barack Obama's immense enormous worldwide celebrity and they don't like to appear in the same place with us. They think it downgrades their star appeal. We're just looking to get things done. We would like for them to meet us on Capitol Hill and work for a compromise that could bring offshore drilling and comprehensive energy into the homes of Americans. People want change right now.

Full Remarks from McCain's Economic Speech in Canada

ARLINGTON, VA — U.S. Senator John McCain will deliver the following remarks as prepared for delivery to the Economic Club of Toronto in Ottawa, Canada, today at 1:00 p.m. EDT:

Thank you all very much. I appreciate the warm welcome to Ottawa, and the hospitality of the Economic Club of Toronto. The reputation of the Economic Club as a place for serious discussion of policy is well known in America, and I am honored by your invitation. There aren't any electoral votes to be won up here in the middle of a presidential election. But there are many shared interests that require our attention today, and many Canadians here I am proud to call friends.

If you've been following the presidential election, you've probably noticed that Canada comes up for discussion quite a bit these days. And this is as it should be — because no other nation shares so many ties with the United States. And today the strength of that partnership is more vital than ever. The economic community we have founded, together with our alliance and the values we hold in common, have served our people for decades, and served us well. It will fall to the next president to strengthen these ties still further, adding to the security and prosperity of all of North America.

We in the United States are very lucky, in a way that's easy to take for granted. We are surrounded by two great oceans, and by two nations we count as friends. Think of the fate of other nations, and how much of their histories have been shaped by hostile neighbors. Generation after generation, they live in fear, resentment, and competition harmful to the interests of all. Lost in rivalry and distrust are the advantages of regional friendship and stability. What a blessing it is for the United States to have in Canada a neighbor we fear only on ice rinks and baseball diamonds.

The best American statesmen have always understood that Canada is not some adjunct to America. We are firm and fast friends. We are allies, partners in success and adversity alike, and a great deal depends on preserving that unity.

Trade is just a part of what unites us, but a very important part. Last year alone, we exchanged some 560 billion dollars in goods, and Canada is the leading export market for 36 of the 50 United States. This country stands as America's leading overall export market, and America is Canada's leading agricultural market. With 60 percent of all direct foreign investment in Canada originating in the United States — some 289 billion dollars in 2007 — our economies draw strength from one another.

A prosperous Canada means a more dynamic and resilient American economy. There are areas where the United States can learn a great deal from your experience. Beginning in 1995, Canada did the hard work to put its fiscal house in order. You reduced spending and brought the budget from deficit to surplus. However, unlike your free-spending neighbor to the south, Canada continued to run budget surpluses even while cutting its corporate and personal tax rates. Lower taxes and spending restraint is a philosophy we should import from Canada.

Our common interests extend to other pursuits as well. The future of our environment, the flows of our energy, and the security of nations — all of these are aided by the close relations forged by our predecessors in Ottawa and Washington. And if I have anything to say about it after January of next year, America is going to expand these ties of friendship and cooperation between our two nations.

At the forefront of our minds, in these years since the Millennium Plot and the events of 9/11, is the security of our citizens. Our governments have made real progress in keeping our borders closed to terrorists and open to trade. Yet this will remain an ongoing challenge and a key issue for the next American administration. Tens of millions of people and vehicles cross the Canadian-American border every year. The two-way trade that crosses the Ambassador Bridge between Detroit and Windsor equals all American exports to Japan. That transit, and all our crossing points, must remain secure. In extending our security partnership, we can ensure continued flows of people and commerce while maintaining security on which these very flows depend. We need to do an even better job of managing the regular traffic across our border.

Already, we cooperate in preparing for emergencies — exchanging information and manpower to coordinate our response to danger. We have agreements in place to work together in detecting radiological and nuclear threats, to improve security at ports, borders, and airports, and to assist first responders. We exchange public health officers and have agreed on principles for screening intercontinental air travelers in the event of a pandemic. In all of this, we are drawing upon the skills and knowledge of one another, and we are joined in the crucial work of protecting our people.

At the same time, Canada and America are joined in other vital causes around the world — from the fight against nuclear proliferation to the fight against global warming, from the fight for justice in Haiti to the fight for democracy in Afghanistan. I, for one, will never forget the response of our Canadian friends to the terrorist attacks of 9/11. It was here in Ottawa, three days later, where tens of thousands of Canadians filled the streets on a National Day of Mourning. The Canadian people even took in Americans who has been left stranded by the shutdown of American air space. We in America have not forgotten your kindness. And we will never forget the solidarity, compassion, and friendship of Canada when it mattered most.

We know as well that Canada, too, has suffered casualties in the years since 9/11, and we honor their memory as we do our own. As always in Canada's history, this nation has been willing to do hard things, even when the costs run high. Along with our other allies, Canada and America are still fighting in defense of Afghanistan — in the honorable cause of freedom for that long suffering country, and greater security for ourselves. To date, Canada has committed nearly two billion dollars to the rebuilding of Afghanistan, including a recent 50% increase at the Paris Conference. It is a generous investment, and a wise one, and together our countries are going to see this mission through.

Even in Iraq, where Canada has not always agreed with American policies, this nation has done all that those differences would allow to help the Iraqi people. In characteristic form, Canada has given generous humanitarian aid and development assistance. And your government has provided more than 770 million in combined assistance and debt relief to Iraq, helping a struggling young democracy at a critical time.

It's the mark of good friends that they're willing to correct you, and to do so without rancor. Many Canadians have objected to the policies of the United States in dealing with terrorists, and with enemy combatants held at the Guantanamo prison. It happens that I also regard the prison at Guantanamo as a liability in the cause against violent radical extremism, and as president I would close it. I intend as well to listen carefully when close allies offer their counsel. And even when they don't volunteer their advice, I'll ask for it and seek it out.

We're going to need that spirit in many efforts. We have a shared destiny, Canada and the United States. We are both continental powers, nations shaped by our diverse heritage and our frontier experience. We are also both Arctic nations. And because of this common geography, we must be acutely aware of the perils posed by global warming and take immediate steps to reverse its effects.

Three years ago, I traveled with some colleagues, including Senator Hillary Clinton and Senator Lindsey Graham, to Yukon territory, a front line of global warming. We flew over miles of devastated spruce forests, every tree killed by insects that thrive in warm temperatures. As the trees die, fires multiply, and across the region the waters are vanishing. We heard from men and women near Whitehorse whose traditional way of life had been radically disrupted.

All of this is just a glimpse of the grave environmental dangers that global warming can bring, unless we act to prevent it. I was among the first in Congress to introduce legislation to curb greenhouse gasses. If I am elected president, it will be a top priority to enact an energy policy equal to this challenge. A sensible cap-and-trade emissions system, for instance, is a critical part of such a policy. Under U.S. and Canadian leadership, the Montreal Protocol began the process of phasing out gases that were destroying our planet's ozone layer. That cap-and-trade system removed the threat of acid rain. I believe we can apply it to great effect against the threat of climate change. And here, too, Canada and America can work in common purpose against common dangers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We must also work to ensure reliable energy supplies and increase sources of renewable energy. As you all know, Canada is America's largest energy supplier. Not only does Canada have the second largest proven oil reserves in the world, 60 percent of the energy produced in Canada is hydroelectric, clean energy. We stand much to gain by harmonizing our energy policies, just as have gained by cooperating in trade through NAFTA. Since NAFTA was concluded, it has contributed to strong job growth and flourishing trade. Since the agreement was signed, the United States has added 25 million jobs and Canada more than 4 million. Cross-border trade has more than doubled since NAFTA came into force. We have established North America as the world's largest economic market and the integration of our economies has led to greater competitiveness of American and Canadian businesses. Because of our common market, our workers are better able to compete, and to find opportunities of their own in the global economy.

There is still more work to do. Complying with NAFTA's rules of origin can be cumbersome and costly. Border delays can pose a serious impediment to trade, the equivalent of a tariff. And even now, for all the successes of NAFTA, we have to defend it without equivocation in political debate, because it is critical to the future of so many Canadian and American workers and businesses. Demanding unilateral changes and threatening to abrogate an agreement that has increased trade and prosperity is nothing more than retreating behind protectionist walls. If I am elected president, have no doubt that America will honor its international commitments — and we will expect the same of others. We will strengthen and extend the open and rules-based international trading system. I aspire to lead a proud, outward-looking America that deepens its partnerships throughout the hemisphere and the world.

Long before NAFTA, America received one of its most valuable exports from Canada in the form of a great statesman, Dean Acheson. He was descended from a great Canadian distilling family and a man who knew Canada well. As secretary of state, Acheson liked to drop by the home of his great friend Hume Wrong, Canada's ambassador to the United States, for consultation and advice over a quiet drink. As I said, Acheson came from a distilling family.

The relationship was not always smooth. But it was productive. Canada and the United States together gave generously for the reconstruction of Europe. And together, too, we helped to forge the new trading system that restored the prosperity of the world after a terrible war.

We've been through an awful lot together, Canada and America, and together we have achieved great things. We have a long shared history to draw from, and deep reserves of good will and mutual admiration. I thank you for all that you have done to advance one of the finest friendships between any two nations in the world today. I thank you for the conviction and clarity you bring to that work ahead for our two nations. And I thank you all for you kind attention here today.

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas

Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.

One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.

She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.

As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.

Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.

In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.

Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.

"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

Thanks again to all for the feedback.

Go Seahawks!

"Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. The Hill: "Hillary's summer: Five takeaways"

By Amie Parnes

August 31, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

The political world is still waiting for a decision from Hillary Clinton on the 2016 presidential race.

But observers have recently got a preview of what would lay in store from, and for, Clinton should she take the plunge.

Over the summer months, she released a book, "Hard Choices," about her time at the State Department and waded into domestic policy for the first time in four years.

So, what did we learn?

1) Anything Clinton says is news. So is anything Clinton doesn't say.

When Clinton last week weighed in on the events in Ferguson, Mo. following the death of 18-year-old Michael Brown at the hands of a police officer, her comments drew instant headlines and lit up the Twitterverse.

During a paid speech at a tech conference in San Francisco, Clinton said that "we can't ignore the inequities that persist in our justice system" and referred to how the unrest in Ferguson had made "our streets look like a war zone."

But the silence that preceded those remarks, which stretched out for more than two weeks during a string of book-signing appearances, also became news.

MSNBC host Chris Hayes took to Twitter to call her failure to comment "downright bizarre." Hayes' tweet followed remarks by civil rights activist Rev. Al Sharpton, another MSNBC host. At a rally, Sharpton had demanded that Clinton, along with potential GOP presidential candidate Jeb Bush, should not "get laryngitis on this issue."

"Nobody can go to the White House unless they stop by our house and talk about policing," Sharpton said.

Hillary allies defended her decision to refrain from immediate comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think it was appropriate that she not quickly discuss it, in part because she is not a candidate yet, and she was not out and about giving speeches at the time,” said one former longtime Hillary aide.

“She also is appropriately cautious in reviewing developing circumstances. She is aware that anything she says is dissected, debated, supported and attacked so that gives her good reason to be measured in remarks on most anything,” the aide added.

2) The left doesn’t really hate her after all

In recent weeks, critics and even some Democratic allies have worried that Clinton has failed to satisfy some on the left.

On Vox.com earlier this month, Ezra Klein wrote that “liberals walk away unnerved” after almost every interview Clinton had done around her recent book tour.

“She bumbled through a discussion of gay marriage with [NPR’s] Terry Gross. She dodged questions about the Keystone XL pipeline. She’s had a lot of trouble discussing income inequality,” Klein asserted.

Other progressives have expressed a desire to see a candidate rooted within the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, such as Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.), challenge Clinton.

But poll numbers provide succor to Clinton supporters.

A CNN poll conducted in late July showed that there was essentially no difference in the backing Clinton received from self-identified liberal Democrats over Democrats as a whole. Sixty-six percent of liberal Democrats supported her, as did 67 percent of all party supporters.

Clinton allies object to the notion that the former secretary of State is in trouble with the left.

“She is progressive and has support from the vast majority of progressives, which I would argue spans from the left to the middle, including some conservative Democrats along the way, too,” said one longtime aide.

Another ally who has worked for Clinton took it a step further, insisting that the he idea of widespread unease about her on the left was a “fictional plot that people want to believe is true.”

3) She’s learned her lesson with women

When Clinton’s campaign ended in 2008, she conducted an unsparing post-mortem on what went wrong, spending meeting after meeting trying to get to the bottom of the matter.

One of the biggest takeaways from those sessions was that she had made a fatal flaw in not embracing the historic nature of her campaign as, potentially, the first female president. Senior strategist Mark Penn had discouraged highlighting gender, a tactic other aides came to see as a monumental error.

Clinton has already determined not to make the same mistake this time around, even before she has made a formal decision on whether to mount a second presidential bid.

Key super-PACs Ready for Hillary and Correct the Record have repeatedly highlighted the work she did for women as secretary of State. And in recent days, it was announced that Clinton will be addressing a women’s forum organized by the DNC next month, further highlighting her interest in appealing to this key constituency.

4) She'll keep facing questions about Obama

Both Clinton and President Obama say they have put the bitterness of their 2008 primary struggle behind them.

But more and more, Clinton has distanced herself from the president on issues, including the civil war in Syria.

Earlier this month, the separation grew more obvious when Clinton said in an interview that "great nations need organizing principle and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

"Don't do stupid stuff," had previously been put forth by Obama as a key rule-of-thumb for his own foreign policy.

Clinton ended up having to call Obama to offer an explanation and her spokesman issued a statement pledging that the two would "hug it out" later.

Further parsing of her relationship with Obama is sure to be a running theme during any future campaign.

5) People love to hate her (and love to love her.)

Alongside, "Hard Choices," two prominent anti-Clinton books hit the bookshelves this summer:" "Clinton Inc." by Daniel Halper and "Blood Feud" by Ed Klein.

While some criticized Klein's book as less-than-credible — even Rush Limbaugh publicly questioned some of the dialogue featured in its pages — it sold well and even bumped Clinton's own tome from the top spot on the New York Times bestseller list.

But Hillary supporters say the summer also showed the depth of enthusiasm for a Clinton presidential candidacy. To date, Ready for Hillary reports having more than 100,000 donors, receiving more than 150,000 contributions and attracting nearly two million supporters on Facebook, far outstripping any comparable operation for a potential candidate from either party.

The support for a presidential run has to be evident by now, former aides note.

"It's gotta be in her head," one said.

Los Angeles Times: "Potential GOP presidential hopefuls woo donors, activists at summit"

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

August 30, 2014, 9:06 p.m. EDT

Potential Republican presidential candidates paraded before more than 3,000 conservative activists and donors from across the country here for a two-day summit that ended Saturday, touting their records and trying to look like the future of their party.

The eighth annual Defending the American Dream Summit was sponsored by Americans for Prosperity, among the most powerful conservative political groups in the country, backed by GOP donors Charles and David Koch, whose family amassed a fortune in the oil business.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's not clear who the Koch brothers might back, given their support for Republican and libertarian causes.

David Koch attended the summit, at one point addressing the crowd and thanking the speakers, in particular Texas Gov. Rick Perry for hosting the summit.

Both Perry and junior Texas Sen. Ted Cruz received raucous applause when they appeared, with many chanting Saturday, "Run, Ted, run!"

"Oddly enough, that's the same thing my wife, Heidi, says to me when I go to the gym," Cruz quipped, never revealing during his speech or a briefing afterward whether he plans to run — though he presented a pretty clear platform.

Cruz vowed to roll back Obamacare and hold the line against "amnesty" for immigrants who entered the country illegally, daring President Obama to "join me at the border." He suggested that the U.S. put more economic pressure on Russia for its actions in Ukraine and attack Islamic State — "bomb them back to the Stone Age."

"We need a president who will stand up and use every tool at our disposal," Cruz said to applause and repeated standing ovations.

Greg Danson, 30, a conservative from Houston who works in the oil industry, said he was wowed by Cruz, who he said appears more intellectual than Perry, more like the future of the party than the folksy past of George W. Bush.

"I don't think Perry can win. He's not as good in debates. He's not going to beat Hillary," Danson said, alluding to the presumed candidacy of former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton. Perry, who has been visiting key primary states, emphasized his tough stance on border security.

When Obama refused to send in the National Guard to address the recent border crisis, Perry told the crowd Friday, he sent the troops himself. That earned the governor a standing ovation.

Perry said that when Obama stopped in Dallas earlier this summer, he asked the president to come see the border crisis.

"He turned me down, saying he doesn't do photo ops," Perry said. A man in the audience shouted, "Shame!"

Perry derided what he called Obama's "era of lawlessness," comparing it — in a nod to tea party activists prominently represented here — to British tyranny over American colonists.

"We need to make Washington as inconsequential in our lives as we can," Perry said to more applause. He added with a chuckle, "In Texas, we actually do pretty well without Washington's advice."

Brandon Rogers, 30, said that out of all the potential candidates, he found Perry most inspiring. Rogers, a filmmaker from Los Angeles, considers himself somewhat libertarian, but not enough to vote for Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, whom he saw as an idealist. He liked Cruz, too, but said, "Perry could mobilize a movement and inspire a nation."

Few indicated they were put off by Perry's recent indictment on two felony charges that stemmed from his threat to withdraw funding for a public integrity unit.

Activists at the summit also heard from Indiana Gov. Mike Pence, who emphasized his record as a fiscal conservative, promising to reduce the scope of the federal government and taking a swipe at spending under the last Republican in the White House, George W. Bush.

"I felt like the Republican Party was a tall ship with a capable captain and a strong crew that was very dangerously off course into the rocky waters of big government," Pence said of the Bush administration. "It's a new season in the Republican Party and the conservative movement."

Pence noted: "Some people say our next nominee should be a governor, and I'm certainly sympathetic to that."

Carol Jones, 67, of Bastrop, Texas, drew a smile from Pence when she called out: "Would you please run for president?"

Jones, a retired field director for Americans for Prosperity, said she had grown disillusioned with Perry and was divided between Paul and Pence.

"I just love what he has done in Indiana. My God, if he can do that in Washington — that's what we need," she said. "He stacks up better than a lot of these other candidates, except Rand Paul."

Some in the crowd were concerned that Paul, son of longtime libertarian Rep. Ron Paul of Texas, would be unwilling to use U.S. military might overseas, particularly against Russia and in the Middle East.

"He's too much of an isolationist," said Doug Vile, 58, a furniture manufacturer from Pauls Valley, Okla., who prefers Cruz and Perry. "One of our responsibilities is to help people all over the world. We're the peacemakers."

But Jones said Paul, whom she got to know campaigning for his father, would take action overseas if needed.

Paul took the stage here and quickly abandoned the lectern, pacing and addressing the audience in a breezy, conversational style that drew applause.

Young attendees clapped and cheered as Paul urged them to join him in recruiting unlikely Republicans — minorities in urban areas, at historically black colleges and, yes, even in Berkeley.

"If we're going to be the party that wins, we have to be a bigger party," he said. "We don't need to be Democrat light. We need to reach out to new people."

New York Post: Ed Klein: "Why Mitt Romney may again be the GOP's next great hope"

By Edward Klein

August 30, 2014, 4:09 p.m. EDT

The most likely Republican presidential candidate for 2016 is . . . Mitt Romney?

The former Massachusetts governor has run and lost two bids for the White House — in the 2008 Republican primaries and again in the 2012 general election. What's more, he proved to be a foot-in-mouth candidate who blew his chances of winning in 2012 by writing off 47% of the electorate and suggesting that illegal immigrants "self-deport."

And yet, establishment insiders in the GOP tell me that the third time may be the charm.

"The smart folks in the party are not committed to any presidential candidate this early," said Scott Reed, the senior political strategist for the US Chamber of Commerce, the powerful business lobby that has scored a string of establishment victories over Tea Party candidates in this year's

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican primaries. “But Romney can’t be dismissed as the guy who lost last time.

“You watch him on TV these days, and he’s a new guy with total command of the issues and a real presence,” Reed added. “He could throw an organization together and get the money.”

A wealthy New York-based Republican with close ties to members of the donor class, who spoke to me on the condition of anonymity, wholeheartedly agrees.

“Most of the people I talk to who are involved in Republican politics as donors want a winner,” he told me. “And many of these people are talking about Romney because so many of the things he said in 2012 — about Russia being a ‘geopolitical foe’ and people losing their health insurance under ObamaCare — have come to pass.”

Until a few months ago, the favorite among establishment Republicans was Chris Christie. And there are still those in the GOP, such as Kenneth Langone, the billionaire co-founder of The Home Depot, who support the New Jersey governor.

“To me, politics is practical,” Langone told me. “We Republicans don’t have the luxury any more of having an ideological litmus test in the party. Chris is a candidate who can win. And though he has never given me a definite indication that he is going to run in 2016, in my humble opinion, he’s in.”

However, most Republicans think Christie has suffered too many self-inflicted wounds to be considered a front-runner.

The list of internal grievances against Christie is long and includes: his hug-a-thon with President Obama after Hurricane Sandy; his it’s-all-about-me keynote address at the 2012 Republican National Convention; his bungled handling of the Bridgegate scandal; and his appointment or reappointment of several liberal judges in New Jersey.

With Christie fading in the presidential sweepstakes, many Republican donors and operatives turned, for a while, to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush as the party’s great hope. But Bush is playing Hamlet, unable to make up his mind.

“Jeb has several problems that give him pause,” said a major Republican source. “To begin with, he has staked out a position on immigration reform and the Common Core education standards that may make him too moderate for today’s Republican Party. Then there are his family problems to take into consideration. His wife isn’t into being a public figure, and his daughter has had drug issues in the past.”

In my conversations with Republican operatives, none could think of a time since the 1980s when there wasn’t an obvious front-runner.

This past week, several potential candidates, including Indiana Gov. Mike Pence, Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Sen. Ted Cruz, showed up at a presidential cattle call in Dallas that was organized by the conservative billionaire Koch brothers.

“We are six months away from when some presidential campaigns in the Republican Party will launch, and it doesn’t appear that the donors are coalescing yet,” said Spencer Zwick, a fund-raising expert who is so close to Romney and his wife, Ann, that he is often described as their “sixth son.”

Washington Post: “Obama sets his own pace in a world whirling with crises”

By Karen DeYoung and Dan Balz

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

August 31, 2014, 10:30 a.m. EDT

Short of world war, it's rare that a chief executive goes through a foreign policy month like President Obama's August.

U.S. warplanes struck in Iraq for the first time in years, as U.S. diplomats struggled to establish a new government in Baghdad. Islamic State militants beheaded an American journalist in Syria and spread their reach across the Middle East.

War raged between Israel and Hamas in Gaza. In Afghanistan, U.S. plans for an orderly exit at the end of the year teetered on the brink of disaster. Russia all but invaded Ukraine and dared Obama to stop it. Libya descended into violent chaos.

As events cascaded, Obama juggled rounds of vacation golf with public statements addressing the conflicts. But his cool demeanor, and the split-screen imagery of a president at play and at work, seemed ill-matched to the moment.

Then came a Thursday news conference and a comment that only reinforced criticism of a president neither fully engaged nor truly leaning into world problems. Speaking of the Islamic State, he said, "We don't have a strategy yet."

The statement may have had the virtue of candor, as Obama weighs the military and diplomatic components of a U.S. response and seeks support from other nations. But it hardly projects an image of presidential resolve or decisiveness at a time of international turmoil.

Republicans pounced on the statement. Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), speaking Friday in Texas, said, "If the president has no strategy, maybe it's time for a new president." He said in a later e-mail that he would call a joint session of Congress to seek authority "to destroy ISIS militarily," using another name for the Islamic State. Texas Gov. Rick Perry accused Obama of "lurching from crisis to crisis, always one step behind."

On Sunday, House Intelligence Committee Chairman Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) said Obama's comments show that his foreign policy is "in an absolute free fall."

"If you look at China, you look at ISIS, you look at Russia, you look at Iran and North Korea, we have a serious host of problems presenting itself, and our traditional allies are now standing up and saying, 'Well, maybe America is not the best one to lead us through these troubles,' " Rogers said on "Fox News Sunday."

Some Democrats also express dismay at Obama's pace. "I think I've learned one thing about this president, and that is he's very cautious. Maybe in this instance, too cautious," Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." The Islamic State, she said, is a "vicious, vicious movement. And it has to be confronted."

White House senior adviser Dan Pfeiffer said Obama will continue to move at his own speed to respond to these crises, regardless of criticism. "There's no timetable for solving these problems that's going to meet the cable news cycle speed," he said. "It's not a tenable thing. We'd much rather do this right than do it quickly. We tried the opposite [during the Bush years] and it worked out very poorly."

This week, Obama will have an opportunity to show global leadership at a crisis-packed summit with European allies. Immediately afterward, Secretary of State John F. Kerry will travel to the Middle East, where potential partners, waiting to see whether Obama has the capacity to chart a clear, decisive course, are hoping for direction.

As the administration heads into those meetings, Kerry offered crisp and forceful marching orders. "Airstrikes alone won't defeat this enemy," he wrote in a Saturday op-ed article in the New York Times. "A much fuller response is demanded from the world. We need to support Iraqi forces and the moderate Syrian opposition, who are facing ISIS on the front lines."

The world Obama now confronts is far different from the one he inherited when he came into office almost six years ago, and it is testing equally whether the style and substance of his leadership can win supporters and prevail against enemies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the first years of his presidency, Obama's principal foreign policy goals were far less reactive and were more dependent on his initiative and sense of timing.

With a schedule for Iraq withdrawal already set, he developed policies for ending the then-faltering war in Afghanistan. In a pattern that would repeat itself on other issues, he deliberated for months, and then split the difference by simultaneously announcing a surge of troops and the timing of their departure.

But as he tried to engage the world on his terms, Obama quickly found out that the world had thoughts and plans of its own. Far from the reset Obama sought with Russia, President Vladimir Putin sought a new balance of power through aggression in Ukraine. While Obama offered a fresh start for the United States in the Muslim world, the Arab Spring headed toward destabilization rather than democracy.

Six years later, events seem to have spun out of his control, and Obama must react to the actions of others. Putin's aggression in Ukraine has sparked the greatest East-West crisis since the Cold War. Islamic State advances have swallowed up a large swath of the Middle East and threaten a global upheaval far beyond the shock of al-Qaeda's 2001 attacks.

Obama now must contemplate what could be a lengthy and messy recommitment of U.S. military might in a region that continues to defy his efforts to create stability. Having promised respectful relations among the big powers, he must prove that the non-military tools of power — diplomacy and economic pressure — will eventually force Russia back within its own borders.

Historian David Kennedy of Stanford University noted that Obama has struggled throughout his presidency to articulate a large and integrated vision in both domestic and foreign policy and contrasted that with the rhetorical and communications skills of Candidate Obama in 2008.

But he said Obama faces something of "devil's brew" as he deals with a world of proliferating aggressors and the palpable exhaustion of the American people for military engagement. "There's an expectation especially since World War II that the United States and president in particular can command events," he said. "That's not true and less true today than ever."

Presidential advisers argue that Obama's foreign policy management has born fruit, from getting the Syrians to give up their chemical weapons to bringing Iran to the negotiating table over its nuclear program to engendering the trust and credibility with other leaders to get European nations to support sanctions against Russia and rebuild a global coalition to deal with the Islamic State threat.

A senior official called Obama's Iranian policy "a perfect example of a disciplined response that potentially leads to a good outcome." Yet even former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton has expressed skepticism that Iranian negotiations will reach a successful conclusion and has been vocal in disagreeing with Obama's earlier decisions not to intervene more directly to support rebel forces in Syria.

Officials across the government spent Friday trying to clean up after Obama's Thursday news conference. They insisted that his "no strategy" remark had been misinterpreted and that what was being portrayed as hesitation and delay was instead a sign of due diligence and a sharp focus on developing an effective long-term plan.

Earlier statements by Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel and Gen. Martin Dempsey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about the overall threat posed by Islamic State militants and the necessity of eventually taking the fight into Syria, coupled with reports that the United States had launched surveillance flights over Syria, prompted speculation of potentially imminent military action.

White House press secretary Josh Earnest denied a contradiction. "I think the president was pretty explicit that he is determined to make sure that every element of his national security strategy is thought through," he said.

As Obama sought to nudge the debate back into his deliberative comfort zone, others urged him toward action. Ryan Crocker, who has served as U.S. ambassador in Iraq, Afghanistan and Syria, pleaded with the president to stop deliberating and start acting. "I don't think we have an alternative to swift, decisive military action to degrade ISIS in both Iraq and Syria. Give them no safe place to plan further attacks," he said in a CNN interview Friday.

U.S. officials rejected the notion that they are not acting. They emphasized that Obama moved quickly in Iraq with airstrikes and said that this month's operations there are the first step in a larger strategy against the Islamic State. They indicated that they will not be pushed into an immediate response to recent events in Syria.

“The dynamic that you want, that I think is possible, is that [Islamic State] has overreached and overextended itself, both in terms of the territory it’s tried to claim, and the number of enemies it’s managed to make,” a senior administration official said.

Limited airstrikes in Iraq, and the formation of a more inclusive version of Iraq’s Shiite-led government, will encourage Sunni Arab states to work together, under U.S. leadership, in ways that have eluded them thus far, the official said.

He added that the “international outrage in countries like Britain, France, Australia and Canada” over militants’ brutality, and the threat from Western passport holders within the Islamist organization, will make those countries more willing to participate in military and other operations against the militants in response to a patient and well-conceived U.S. strategy.

U.S. allies say they have a residual well of confidence in Obama despite what they saw as the failure of U.S. leadership over the past year in Syria.

“What I do regret,” said a senior European official, is that the Islamic State organization has become “exactly what we feared” last year, when Obama held back in arming moderate rebel forces in Syria and reversed course on U.S. military action there.

The Syria airstrikes, planned last August to punish President Bashar al-Assad for using chemical weapons and to destroy his weapons program, might have avoided the current mess by sending a message to Syrians and U.S. allies that Obama was engaged and recognized the growing Islamist threat, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid publicly criticizing the president.

But the official believes that this summer has been different. Obama’s taking the lead on sanctions against Russia — and pressing reluctant Europeans to join — and the airstrikes this month against Islamic State in Iraq have gone some distance in restoring allied confidence in the president.

“It’s not my job to defend the administration,” the official said. “But they have acted, more than I expected.”

Obama addressed the global angst during a Friday fundraiser for the Democratic National Committee in Purchase, N.Y. He said that anyone watching the nightly news might feel that “the world is falling apart.” He acknowledged these are challenging times and that an unsustainable “old order” that had been in place for decades in the Middle East was destined to come apart.

“What we are seeing is the old order not working, but the new order not being born yet — and it is a rocky road through that process, and a dangerous time through that process,” he said.

American leadership “has never been more necessary, and there’s really no competition out there for the ideas and the values that can create the sort of order that we need in this world. . . . Our values, our leadership, our military power but also our diplomatic power, the power of our culture is one that means we will get through these challenging times just like we have in the past,” he said.

Jim Lindsay, senior vice president at the Council on Foreign Relations, said Obama’s inability to inspire confidence among critics has more to do with the complexity of the problems than the president’s leadership style. “He has a sort of perfect storm of messy problems, lousy options, ambivalent allies and a skeptical public,” he said.

Obama’s attempt at reassurance begged the question not only of exactly what course of action he will decide to take, but whether those policies will be too little, too late.

The crises in Ukraine and Syria-Iraq have overshadowed equally turbulent situations where the administration’s track record has not been encouraging. This summer’s war between Israel and Hamas in the Gaza Strip continued for weeks, despite repeated U.S. efforts to stop it, until a tentative cease-fire was agreed upon under Egyptian auspices last week.

Despite two emergency visits by Kerry in the past several weeks, Afghanistan appeared headed toward a political train wreck, as the two candidates vying to replace President Hamid Karzai continued to dispute the results of this summer's election. With the withdrawal of U.S. combat forces in December fast approaching, it remains uncertain whether there will be a government to agree to Obama's plan to leave nearly 10,000 troops there for training and counterterrorism missions.

Kennedy, the historian, said that Obama, in dealing with multiple crises, also is trying to change perceptions of what U.S. leadership and any president can realistically accomplish. "It's difficult virtually to the point of impossibility to have a grand strategy in a world that is so fluid and in which we no longer yield the power we once had. In a sense that is Obama's strategy, a recognition of that fact. So that rhetorically as well as in reality, he's trying to diminish the expectation that we can control events."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Celebs gin up votes for midterm push"

By Jesse Byrnes

August 30, 2014, 5:10 p.m. EDT

With young voters more apathetic about voting and government than ever, several organizations are trying to woo the "selfie generation" to the polls this fall.

"About half of those who vote in presidential elections do not vote in midterms," explained Andy Bernstein, executive director of HeadCount, a non-partisan organization that partners with musicians to get youth engaged in politics.

While overall turnout among young voters in presidential elections has grown, turnout for midterms has stagnated, according to the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement (CIVIC).

In 2010, the under-30 vote dropped 27 percent since Obama first sailed to victory two years earlier, according to CIVIC analysis of Census data.

Bernstein's group hopes to engage these so-called drop-off voters by riding the popularity of musicians.

HeadCount will go on tour with the band The Black Keys for 15 shows in more than a dozen cities from Sept. 6 through Nov. 3 registering young voters.

The group also plans to drive voter turnout through its Pledge to Vote postcards, which involves celebrities taking photos of themselves holding a sign to register to vote and posting it to social media.

During National Voter Registration Day in 2012, for example, HeadCount got about 200 musicians, actors and comics to hold the signs, including Stephen Colbert, Dave Matthews and 50 Cent.

Their cause was also cheered by actress Susan Sarandon, Cyndi Lauper and musician Jeff Tweedy of Wilco, among others. As a result, the group registered about 40,000 people in a single day.

Musicians and celebrities often jump into the political game, most often for Democrats. For instance, Katy Perry has already promised to write Hillary Clinton's campaign song if she runs for president. Other entertainers were heavily involved in President Obama's presidential runs, including Beyonce, Jay-Z and Bruce Springsteen.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While their focus is usually on presidential races, the groups's uphill task ahead of 2016 is getting youth involved in the elections happening this year.

Of likely midterm voters ages 18-29, 44 percent of Mitt Romney supporters in 2012 plan to vote this year compared to 35 percent of Obama voters, according to another Harvard Institute of Politics survey.

Still, in an election with Senate control up for grabs, Republicans are unlikely to see much of a bump from young voters – less than one in four (23 percent) will "definitely" be voting in November, according to the spring poll.

That's the case in other surveys, too. While 72 percent of those 18-31 said they would "definitely" or "probably" vote in the 2016 presidential election, less than half – 49 percent – said they were likely to vote in the upcoming midterms, according to a poll from Democratic pollster Paul Harstad in early spring.

During every election, it's important to use cultural leaders to get young voters interested in the issues, said Ashley Spillane, president of Rock the Vote.

Celebrities, artists and musicians help draw young voters interested in other issues, Spillane said, such as voter ID laws, women's health and college affordability.

"When you are thinking about this generation, in terms of messaging we are constantly expressing our opinion on a myriad of social platforms," Spillane said, noting the importance of offering tools and meeting the so-called digital natives where they are at to register – online.

Have to print a form, find an envelope and put it in the mail? "Most young people can't tell you where to get a stamp these days," she said.

Rock the Vote, which works with hundreds of organizations to run events, has a handful of large events to roll out soon.

A big push for the youth vote will be National Voter Registration Day on Sept. 23. The day, which started in 2012, became a holiday when the National Association of Secretaries of State designated the fourth Tuesday each September through 2019.

This year, more than 300 entertainers and musicians will post photos on social media holding HeadCount's Register to Vote signs linking to their online voter registration page and the group will host events in 20 cities that day.

The group will also have young people sign pledges to vote – and get entered for a chance at a musical vacation getaway. Those pledges will get mailed back to them as a reminder, which has been shown to increase participation.

Growing the youth vote is critical for both parties. Following the 2012 election, the GOP published its 97-page report on attracting more voters, including youth, and noted it must draw young voters with its message and candidates. The report even recommended establishing an "RNC Celebrity Task Force" to get entertainment folks to highlight fundraisers.

Democrats contend, however, that young voters are naturally left-leaning on most issues, putting the focus for Democrats, then, on mobilization.

"The message doesn't matter if they're not on the same page ideologically," said Rob Flaherty, youth media director for the Democratic National Committee.

Still, young voters, like Americans in general, are mostly concerned about jobs, the economy and healthcare, Republicans argue based on recent polling.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"While celebrity endorsements are nice, young Americans are more interested in policies that will benefit them rather than having a famous person tell them who to vote for," Raffi Williams, the Republican National Committee deputy press secretary, wrote in an email.

"They fell for the celebrity endorsements when it came to Obama and are not going to fall prey to the same tactic that has left them behind six years later," he added.

Associated Press: "Militia Says It 'Secured' US Compound in Libya"

[No Writer Mentioned]

August 31, 2014, 12:40 p.m. EDT

The Islamist-allied militia group in control of Libya's capital has "secured" a U.S. Embassy residential compound there, more than a month after American personnel evacuated from the country over ongoing fighting, one of its commanders said Sunday.

The Islamist militia's move likely will reinvigorate debate in the U.S. over its role in Libya, more than three years after supporting rebels who toppled dictator Moammar Gadhafi. It also comes near the two-year anniversary of the slaying of U.S. Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans in Libya's second-largest city of Benghazi.

An Associated Press journalist walked through the U.S. Embassy compound Sunday after the Dawn of Libya, an umbrella group for Islamist militias, invited onlookers inside. Some windows at the compound had been broken, but it appeared most of the equipment there remained untouched. The journalist saw treadmills, food, televisions and computers still inside.

A commander for the Dawn of Libya group, Moussa Abu-Zaqia, told the AP that his forces had entered and been in control of the compound since last week, a day after it has seized control of the capital and its international airport after weeks of fighting with a rival militia. Abu-Zaqia said the rival militia was in the compound before his troops took it over.

The Dawn of Libya militia is not associated with the extremist militia Ansar al-Shariah, which Washington blames for the deadly assault on the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi on Sept. 11, 2012, that killed Stevens and the three other Americans.

A video posted online Sunday showed unarmed men playing in a pool at the compound and jumping into it from a second-story balcony. Voices heard in the video identified it as the U.S. Embassy compound.

In a message on Twitter, U.S. Ambassador to Libya Deborah Jones said the video appeared to have been shot in at the embassy's residential annex, though she said she couldn't "say definitively" since she wasn't there.

"To my knowledge & per recent photos the US Embassy Tripoli chancery & compound is now being safeguarded and has not been ransacked," she wrote on Twitter. She did not immediately respond to a request to elaborate. State Department officials in Washington also declined to immediately comment.

On July 26, U.S. diplomats evacuated the compound and the capital to neighboring Tunisia under a U.S. military escort as fighting between rival militias intensified and thousands fled. The State Department said embassy operations would be suspended until the security situation improved.

Typically, local forces provide security for diplomatic posts, but Libya's government has largely relied on militias for law enforcement since Gadhafi's ouster, as its military and police forces remain weak. In the past several weeks, the security vacuum in Tripoli deepened as militia violence worsened. It remains unclear who the U.S. left in control of guarding its facilities after its personnel evacuated.

Libya's militias, many of which originate from rebel forces that fought Gadhafi, have become powerful players in post-war Libya. Successive governments have put militias on their payroll in return for maintaining order, but rivalries over control and resources have led to fierce fighting among them and posed a constant challenge to the central government and a hoped-for transition to democracy.

Following weeks of fighting that brought the capital to a standstill, the Dawn of Libya militia said last week it managed to seize control of Tripoli's airport and drive a rival militia from the mountain town of Zintan out of the capital. It is now deployed around the capital and has sought to restore normalcy in the city. The group called on foreign diplomats to return now that the fighting has subsided.

LAS VEGAS (AP) — Former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton told a Las Vegas crowd Monday night that more needs to be done to assure young people can achieve their dreams and free students from onerous college debt "that can feel like an anchor tied to their feet dragging them down."

"I think our young people deserve a fair shot," she told about 900 people gathered in a Bellagio resort ballroom for the annual UNLV Foundation dinner benefiting the University of Nevada, Las Vegas.

Later, talking about the American public's possible reluctance to get involved in conflicts around the world, Clinton referred to the threats posed by the Ebola virus and the Islamic State group.

"They want to bring the fight to Europe and the fight to the United States," she said of the terrorist group.

And Ebola is not going to stay confined, she said.

At every step, officials should ask if actions are in America's best interest, she said.

"We can't say we're not going to be involved because these things are other people's problems," she said.

The remarks were part of questions from longtime friend and Las Vegas Sun Publisher Brian Greenspun after Clinton's prepared speech that touched on her thoughts on Russian President Vladimir Putin ("I see a very cold-blooded, calculated former KGB agent who is determined to not only enrich himself and his closest colleagues but also to try to revive Russia's influence around its border"), the most important person she's ever met (Nelson Mandela for his "level of self-awareness and political skill") and her most difficult decision as secretary of state ("Whether or not to go after Bin Laden based on the evidence we had.").

But before any questions, Greenspun presented her a gift: a pair of Nike athletic shoes, a reference to one of her last appearances in Las Vegas in April when a woman in the crowd threw a shoe at Clinton.

"How do we make amends?" he asked. By giving her two shoes instead of just the one.

Greenspun pointed out the pair came from the "running" shoes section, a coy reference to speculation surrounding a possible presidential run by Clinton.

She didn't give anything away about her future plans after Greenspun pressed a second time asking about any unfinished business she might have and how she would finish it, a reference to a chapter in her book, "Hard Choices."

"I'm really going to have to ponder that seriously," she said.

Before Monday's event, Clinton made a stop in Denver to campaign for Colorado Sen. Mark Udall and later appeared at a Nevada Democratic Party fundraiser in Las Vegas with Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid. The Las Vegas Sun reported that VIP tickets to the fundraiser at the Aria resort cost $10,000 each.

The UNLV Foundation dinner honored billionaire Republican fundraiser and Sands Corp. CEO Sheldon Adelson.

Clinton, who commended Adelson for his donations to the university, said she had run into the casino-hotel mogul backstage.

"Sheldon said to me, 'Gee, I wish they would have paired me with you to ask the questions. We could have had a real debate,'" Clinton said. "Well, that would certainly bring a crowd," she said, adding that it might have required a boxing ring.

Adelson's Las Vegas Sands has committed giving $7 million to fund construction of Hospitality Hall for the university's Harrah Hotel College and a proposed Center for Professional and Leadership Studies.

The event also posthumously honored philanthropist Kitty Rodman whose estate pledged $12.9 million for the university's special education programs.

Las Vegas Sun: "Hillary Clinton's Las Vegas visit shows signs of White House ambitions"

Hillary Clinton's night in Las Vegas showed all the signs of someone running to be the most powerful person in the world.

The former secretary of state helped raise money for fellow Democrats. She spoke about education, war and peace. She even congratulated Republican super donor Sheldon Adelson for his UNLV philanthropy.

Clinton's keynote address made no reference to higher office. But the 900 students, donors and politicians who attended the UNLV Foundation's annual dinner saw plenty of signals.

Her question-and-answer session with Brian Greenspun, the Las Vegas Sun editor and publisher and a UNLV trustee, featured a mix of lighthearted stories about people she's met in politics and showcased Clinton's work in international affairs.

Clinton and Adelson

Before delivering her keynote address, Clinton had a word with Adelson, CEO of the Las Vegas Sands Corp. The UNLV Foundation honored Adelson tonight for donating $7 million. When Clinton and Adelson crossed paths backstage, they didn't trade partisan jabs. Clinton said that Adelson told her he wished that he was asking the questions on stage. "That would have been a debate," Adelson reportedly told Clinton. Clinton told the crowd, dining in the Tower Ballroom at the Bellagio, "We would have needed a boxing arena."

Education

Clinton used her keynote address to aim at problems in higher education. She attacked "fly-by-night for-profit schools" and predatory lenders that "exploit students." She hinted at Congress' inability to pass higher education reforms to tackle the problems. She said the solutions "shouldn't be partisan or controversial."

"I don't think any group, any political party, any business, any sector of the economy, any politician has all the answers. In fact, I think it's time we got back to working together again," she said.

Clinton's keynote speech also touched on what Nevada is doing to improve its worst-in-the-nation public education system.

She said her family's charity — the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation — is working with Barrick Gold Corp. to develop programs at Great Basin Community College and vocational programs to train Nevadans (Greenspun is on the Barrick Gold board of directors). Clinton, who was paid $225,000 for speaking, donated the money to her family charity.

Speaking like a candidate

If Clinton does run for office, she will inevitably face questions about her time as secretary of state.

Asked about tough decisions she made as the chief foreign policy adviser to President Barack Obama, Clinton spoke about the "excruciating analysis" before going after Osama bin Laden in Pakistan.

"A lot of the assessments that pointed to his compound in Abbottabad was 40 to 60 percent reliable," she said. Then she added: "Sorting that through was a really difficult decision."

She didn't specifically address an attack at a consulate in Benghazi, Libya, that killed four American officials. Critics blamed Clinton for not doing enough to protect diplomats in Benghazi and for her handling of the investigation that followed.

Clinton said military force should be a last resort but said the U.S. cannot retreat from the world's problems.

"I don't think the United States can solve every problem in the world. But I don't think you can solve problems without the United States," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She didn't back away from questions about Russian President Vladimir Putin, calling him "a cold-blooded former KGB agent."

She added: "In my dealings with Putin, we've had an ongoing exchange of argumentation and heated views from time to time. He is someone who can be understood and dealt with. But it takes a long-term strategic commitment."

She said Putin has influenced Russia's neighbors with natural gas holdings and by having his "friends" purchase media companies in Eastern European states.

She said the world "cannot allow the borders of Europe to be re-written the way Putin is trying to rewrite Ukraine. ... That will be bad for us."

Running shoes

Clinton has now visited Las Vegas three times this year. Her first visit made headlines after a woman threw a shoe at her during a speech before the Institute of Scrap Recycling Industries convention in April at Mandalay Bay.

Greenspun apologized for the incident, and without saying anything about Clinton's purported aspirations to run for president in 2016, handed her a pair of Nike running shoes.

Las Vegas Review-Journal: "Clinton raises campaign cash; advocates for affordable education"

By Laura Myers

October 13, 2014, 9:33 p.m.

Speaking to supporters of higher education, Hillary Clinton Monday night urged the private business community to partner with the University of Nevada, Las Vegas to help more young people earn college degrees that will give them more opportunity for higher paying jobs of the future.

Now, Clinton said, the cost of education is too high for many students, particularly those with little money and access to grants and scholarships. And the job market is so challenging that even graduates with college degrees are having difficulty finding their first job to launch their careers.

The millennial generation is talented, smart and hard-working, but doesn't have as many job opportunities as Clinton did when she was young, she said, speaking at the annual UNLV Foundation dinner held to thank top donors to the university.

As a result, young people are delaying launching careers of their choice, buying their first homes and even getting married, she said.

"We have a lot more work to do if we want to unleash the full potential and make sure more Americans feel they, too, have a future," Clinton said to applause. "That's especially true for our young people. … Many Millennials are still struggling … in a difficult job market."

Clinton, a former secretary of state who is expected to run for president in 2016 on the Democratic ticket, also said that post-graduation many students are burdened by student debt "that can feel like an anchor dragging them down." This, too, puts their future at risk, she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton praised President Barack Obama for increasing federal Pell grants by $1,000 and working to cap student loan repayments at 10 percent of discretionary income, but she said young people feel overwhelmed by debt even as they struggle to find employment in their field of study.

“More needs to be done,” she said. “Higher education shouldn’t be a privilege for those able to afford it. It should be an opportunity widely available for anybody with the talent, determination and ambition” to learn.

Clinton said her family’s non-profit charity, the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation, has started a program “Job One” to partner private business with higher education to help students.

In Nevada, she said, Barrick Gold has partnered with Great Basin Community College and the Shoshone Tribe to develop education and job programs to help students get more work experience.

“We think that first job is essential,” Clinton said. “I think our young people deserve a fair shot. And Barrick Gold’s investment in Nevada is one example … to prepare young people to compete.”

Clinton praised UNLV for deciding to open a medical school and aiming for Tier 1 status as a university. And she urged the business community to get more involved instead of just counting on government to help students. In the end, she said, it will help companies’ bottom lines.

UNLV President Dan Snyder “has been known to say you can’t have a great city without a great university. I think he’s right,” Clinton summed up.

After her 25-minute speech, Las Vegas Sun Publisher Brian Greenspun, a Clinton family friend, gave the former first lady a pair of tennis shoes, saying they were “running shoes,” a not so subtle hint that she should run for the White House. It also evoked memories of a Las Vegas speech Clinton gave in the spring during which a protester threw a pair of shoes at her, which she ducked.

Before Clinton spoke, UNLV honored Sands Chairman Sheldon Adelson for donating $7 million to the university this past year for the hotel college, his latest effort to support the school.

Adelson also is one of the most generous GOP political donors and would likely support any Republican candidate who ran against Clinton if she runs for president.

Clinton said she chatted backstage with Adelson and he told her, “I wish they’d paired me with you to ask the questions. We could have a real debate.”

“Well, that would certainly draw a crowd,” Clinton quipped. “I think you’d need a boxing arena for that to be pulled off.”

More than 900 people attended the sold-out UNLV dinner at the Bellagio where the top donor tables went for $3,000 to $20,000 each. The Foundation raised more than $350,000 from top donors alone, and the annual UNLV dinner was expected to make a profit, according to the university. UNLV also raised nearly $235,000 from a pledge drive held during the dinner, the university said.

The dinner also honored the late Kitty Rodman, a longtime UNLV supporter, whose estate Monday donated a record high $12.9 million gift to the College of Education. The money will support scholarships and graduate fellowships for UNLV students studying special education.

Clinton was paid $225,000 for the hour-long event, including her speech and question-and-answer session, a fee that has been criticized because it’s coming from a non-profit educational foundation. UNLV student leaders also have called on Clinton to donate her fee to the university instead of giving it to her family’s Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation.

Under Clinton’s contract, the UNLV event initially was closed to media coverage. But she had a change of heart and last week UNLV said her 8 p. m. speech would be open to press coverage.

Clinton and former President Bill Clinton have made $100 million from speaking fees since leaving the White House in 2001. The high fees have become an issue even before Clinton officially announces a presidential run. Critics question whether she has lost touch with the middle class.

During her recent book tour, Clinton defended accepting high speaking fees by noting that she and her husband were “dead broke” when they left the White House.

Before the UNLV Foundation dinner, Clinton headlined a private Nevada Democratic Party fundraiser where donors were asked to contribute from $1,000 to $10,000 each. Money went to the state party and to U.S. Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., for his 2016 re-election campaign.

Denver Post: “Hillary Clinton campaigns for Sen. Mark Udall at Denver Union Station”

By Lynn Bartels

October 13, 2014, 6:09 p.m. MDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton surprised travelers at Denver Union Station when she and U.S. Sen. Mark Udall showed up Monday afternoon.

Clinton, the presumed frontrunner for the Democratic nomination for president in 2016, talked to shoppers and laughed with a barista when she ordered coffee as part her swing through various states to help Democratic candidates.

The visit to Union Station came after Clinton appeared at the Brown Palace for a fundraiser for Udall, who faces a tough election challenge from Republican Congressman Cory Gardner. Ballots for the Nov. 4 election will be mailed this week.

The Associated Press reported that while at Union Station, Clinton marveled at the barista's ability to draw a pattern in the foam atop their beverages; she got a smiling pig in honor of the shop's name, Pigtrain Coffee Co., Udall, a well-known environmentalist, a leaf.

"Is that a marijuana plant?" Clinton asked, laughing, a reference to Colorado's newly legalized recreational marijuana industry.

It was a return visit of sorts for Clinton.

In June, she and former President Bill Clinton chose Union Station's Great Hall for an evening event venue while finishing touches of its renovation were still under way, during the Clinton Global Initiative America conference. Bigwigs dined on food specially prepared by chefs from Denver restaurants and listened to music, weeks before Union Station's reopening.

Bill Clinton had been scheduled to headline a fundraiser for Udall on Sept. 27 but cancelled because of the birth of his granddaughter the night before. He spoke to donors by speakerphone.

Associated Press: "Hillary Clinton swings by Colorado to help Udall"

By Nicholas Riccardi

October 13, 2014, 7:39 p.m. EDT

DENVER (AP) — Hillary Clinton swung by Colorado to help out embattled Democratic Sen. Mark Udall on Monday during a western swing in which she also spoke of being a new grandmother.

Clinton held a closed-door fundraiser for Udall, who is facing a tough challenge from Rep. Cory Gardner. They ordered coffee at Denver's refurbished Union Station, and she paused to shake hands, posed for photos and lent her political celebrity to the incumbent a day before ballots are mailed to voters.

The former secretary of state was quick to beckon 10-year-old Macy Friday out of the crowd of onlookers to pose for photos with her, her brother and her father Derek, who introduced his mother Elaine, who had just arrived from Ohio.

"Most important, she's the grandmother," Clinton said.

"You're a grandmother," Elaine Friday said.

"I know," said Clinton, whose daughter Chelsea gave birth to her first child on Sept. 26. "Isn't it the best?"

As they grabbed coffees at a shop inside the station, Clinton and Udall chatted about the next stop on her schedule — aMonday evening event for Nevada Democrats in Las Vegas. The two discussed Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

"He's a good leader," Clinton said of Reid, who has been used by Republicans to attack Democrats this year, including Udall.

Clinton also marveled at the barista's ability to draw a pattern in the foam atop their beverages — she got a smiling pig in honor of the shop's name and Udall, a well-known environmentalist, a leaf.

"Is that a marijuana plant?" Clinton asked, laughing, a reference to Colorado's newly legalized recreational marijuana industry.

Clinton is in the middle of a trip to support Democrats in key races, with stops in Kentucky, Iowa, Michigan and Pennsylvania.

Udall can use her help. He's been deadlocked in the polls with Gardner since the congressman hopped into the race more than six months ago.

Bill Clinton had been scheduled to headline a fundraiser for Udall on Sept. 27, but ended up appearing by speakerphone after the birth of his granddaughter the night before.

Elko Daily Free Press opinion: Gregg Potter: "Proud to have Hillary Clinton at UNLV"

By Gregg Potter

October 13, 2014

As a proud graduate of the University of Nevada Las Vegas, I am thrilled that Hillary Clinton is speaking at the UNLV Foundation's annual dinner Monday night. She is one of the most well-known and respected women in the world, and UNLV is lucky to have her. Her attendance will raise money for the University, the Clinton Foundation, and will add to the long list of work she has done to promote education in the United States and throughout the world.

The Las Vegas Review-Journal reported in early July that the UNLV Foundation had already raised an impressive $353,000, and that it expects to make a profit for only the third time in the event's history. Considering that was months ago, before individual tickets had even gone on sale, there is no doubt the event will be a huge success. And there is no doubt that Hillary Clinton will be the reason why.

The UNLV community won't be the only one benefiting from Hillary's appearance -- the speaking fee is going directly to the Clinton Foundation, her family's charitable foundation that contributes about $20 million every year to address the most critical problems facing people in this country and all over the world, including education.

But Hillary Clinton has done so much more to promote education than just raise money.

After law school, she worked for the Children's Defense Fund, the country's leading child advocacy organization that strives to level the playing field for all children by ensuring access to a quality education, among other things. In Arkansas, she led the effort to reform the state's educational system and improve academic standards. In the Senate, she fought to expand access to early childhood education for low-income children and make college more affordable and accessible. As Secretary of State, she made advancing education of girls around the world a major focus of U.S. foreign policy. And now, through her work at the Clinton Foundation, she's launched the Too Small To Fail Initiative to close the achievement gap for low-income children, and the CHARGE program to allow 14 million girls in the developing world attend secondary school.

She's taken real action that has made a real difference in the lives of so many people – including me.

I grew up in a rural Wisconsin town of 400 people. My family, like most in the town, didn't have a lot of money. But my mother worked hard to provide for my brother and me, and to ensure that we could have more opportunities than she did. It's what Hillary calls "the basic bargain of America: no matter who you are or where you come from, if you work hard and play by the rules, you will have the opportunity to build a good life for yourself and your family."

Even though UNLV is one of our country's great public universities that provides the quality education of a top-tier school without the exorbitant price tag, I still couldn't cover the costs on my own. Luckily, I received a Pell Grant, which are need-based grants from the federal government that do not have to be repaid. I took out student loans to pay for the remainder of the costs.

Because of Hillary Clinton's work in the Senate to increase funding to the federal Pell Grant program and to reduce the burden of student loan debt, I was able to receive a top-notch education without accumulating monstrous debt.

And it allowed and – inspired me – to pursue my education further at the Clinton School of Public Service, the nation's first school to offer a Master of Public Service degree. Stemming from Clintons' commitment to making the world a better place, the Clinton School combines academics with hands on service projects. From the concepts I learned in the classroom to my work to reduce the rejection of LGBT refugees in South Africa, the Clinton School gave me the tools to create positive social change. After graduation, I formed Project Kinect, to share those tools with other doers and help them make a real impact.

There is no better person to speak about education than Hillary Clinton, who has spent her entire career increasing educational opportunities for so many people, including me. I know we all will welcome her with open arms.

CNN: "GOP spotlights fees ahead of Clinton Vegas fundraisers"

By Dan Merica

October 13, 2014, 1:43 p.m. EDT

Republicans looking to fault Hillary Clinton hope the few hours the former secretary of state will spend in Las Vegas on Mondaywill remind voters of her less-than-perfect book roll-out and high-dollar speaking fees.

Clinton, who starts her day in Denver for a fundraiser with Sen. Mark Udall, will make two appearances in Las Vegas on Monday. She will first headline a fundraiser for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid at the Aria Hotel and Casino, then the former secretary of state will keynote a fundraiser or the The University of Nevada-Las Vegas Foundation at the swanky Bellagio.

Republicans are seizing on the second speech, where Clinton, the prohibitive favorite for the Democrats' presidential nomination in 2016, will collect $225,000 for her appearance, according to event organizers.

Although a Clinton spokesperson argues that the fee will go straight to the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation, the former first lady's appearance in Las Vegas on Monday was possibly the most controversial and widely talked about paid speech Clinton was set to give this year.

"Clinton's Nevada Pay Day," said an email from the Republican National Committee. "As Clinton's Long-Awaited Silver State Pay Day Arrives, A Reminder Of The Troubles It Caused Her Would-Be Campaign."

"The much anticipated Hillary UNLV speech reminds us that Hillary's exorbitant fees and travel requirements are going to be problematic on her run for the White House," RNC Press Secretary Kirsten Kukowski said in an email.

When Clinton's appearance at the UNLV fundraiser was announced in June, students at the university protested the fact the foundation was spending money to bring Clinton in at the same time that their tuition was going up due to budget issues.

"In keeping with Secretary Clinton's long-standing history of advocating for students in higher education, we as student government leaders are asking that she charitably donate part or all of the $225,000 speaking fee she is reportedly making for this fundraising speech back to the UNLV Foundation of UNLV as a whole," Elias Benjelloun, the UNLV student body president, and Daniel Waqar, the student government's public relations director, wrote in a letter addressed to Clinton's foundation.

The letter goes on to ask Clinton "to do what is right" and donate the money. "This would be an incredible opportunity for Secretary Clinton to remain true to her commitment to higher education," they write.

The students, however, never heard from Clinton or the foundation, but are not planning to protest outside the event on Monday.

UNLV and Clinton have defended the event.

"Private donations secured by the UNLV foundation from donors funded her speaking fee which was paid to the Harry Walker Agency," Afsha Bawany, a spokesperson for UNLV, said over the summer. University administrators have also argued that the money the event will bring in will far outweigh the money paid the Clinton.

Clinton also told ABC News in August that "all of the fees have been donated to the Clinton Foundation for it to continue its life-changing and life-saving work."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That hasn't stopped Republicans from using the fees to knock Clinton's comments on her personal wealth.

During the first interview of her book rollout Clinton argued that she and her husband were "dead broke" when they left the White House in 2000. The comment rang hollow, even to many Democrats, given that the Clintons went on to make millions on the paid speaking tour and in book sales.

Republicans used fees like that from UNLV to constantly remind people of Clinton's wealth and inarticulate comments for much of the summer.

"Greedy," said Tim Miller, executive director of America Risng, an anti-Clinton super PAC. "Hey kids, I know that tuition is skyrocketing and you all are loaded up with student debt but I'm going to go ahead and take in $1.8 million from your universities for 8 hours of speeches anyway," Miller said in an email to reporters.

Reid, who Clinton will appear with on Monday, did not pile on, however, and refused to criticize Clinton's UNLV speech.

"Anything we can do to focus attention on UNLV, that's extremely important to do, and this certainly will focus attention on UNLV, and that's why they have these people come," Reid told the Las Vegas Review Journal in June.

The Reid-Clinton relationship, especially in the context of Clinton's possible 2016 bid, has been on full display in the last six months.

Reid sent a fundraising email for Ready for Hillary over the weekend, touting Clinton as someone "doing everything she can" to help Democrats get elected in 2016.

The Senate majority Leader also invited Clinton to headline his green energy conference in Las Vegas earlier this year, where Reid said he had "such admiration for the Clinton family."

"She's the best," Reid said of Clinton.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Elizabeth Warren Highlights Hillary Clinton's Goldman Problem"

By Peter Nicholas

October 13, 2014, 12:56 p.m. EDT

A large swath of liberals will be sorely disappointed if Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.) sits out the 2016 presidential election.

In Ms. Warren they see a feisty crusader for the underclass. When some liberals look at Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, they see instead a mainstream figure who is too cozy with the Wall Street firms that helped trigger the financial collapse in 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As it stands now, Mrs. Clinton is almost certain to run in '16 and Ms. Warren is likely to opt out.

But Ms. Warren isn't shy about making known her view that the U.S. political system is "rigged" in favor of powerful interests, an argument that only makes the left pine for her all the more and keep the "Draft Warren" movement alive.

In an interview with Ms. Warren published Sunday in Salon, Thomas Frank, author of the book, "What's the Matter with Kansas," describes the freshman senator as "the single most exciting Democrat currently on the national stage."

She offers a mixed assessment of President Barack Obama's record. Though she praised him for establishing a consumer bureau aimed at protecting people from predatory lenders and rapacious credit card companies, she also said his economics team aligned itself with Wall Street. One of Mr. Obama's top economic advisers was Lawrence Summers, who made millions of dollars from the financial firm D.E. Shaw & Co. before joining the White House in 2009.

"They protected Wall Street," Ms. Warren said. "Not families who were losing their homes. Not people who lost their jobs. Not young people who were struggling to get an education. And it happened over and over."

She added: "At the same time, he [Mr. Obama] picked his economic team and when the going got tough, his economic team picked Wall Street."

Repeating a term she used in her Democratic presidential convention speech in 2012, Ms. Warren said the political system is "rigged" in favor of moneyed interests.

"It's the armies of lobbyists and lawyers who are always at the table, who are always there to make sure that in every decision that gets made, their clients' tender fannies are well protected," she said.

At the same time, "there are very few people at the decision-making table to argue for minimum-wage workers. Very few people."

Ms. Warren took no swipes at Mrs. Clinton. Along with other women Democratic senators, she has signed a letter supporting a Clinton presidential bid. But she did take aim at Goldman Sachs GS -0.90%, a firm with close ties to the Clinton family.

In the two decades since the Clintons arrived on the national political stage, Goldman Sachs Group Inc. has been the couple's top Wall Street contributor, kicking in nearly $5 million to various Clinton causes.

Ms. Warren said in the interview that banking "regulators all meet with Goldman Sachs executives and employees day after day after day. They don't see the people who get tricked, the people who get cheated, the people who get fooled by the products that Goldman turns out."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Warren inches away from Obama"

By Peter Schroeder

October 14, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) is beginning to distance herself from President Obama amid increased speculation about what role she wants to play in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From charging that the president has “protected” Wall Street to voting against the administration’s strategy for arming the Syrian rebels, Warren is flashing an independent streak from her populist perch in the Democratic Party.

“What she’s trying to do is influence the debate. She is not somebody who is there to go along to get along,” said one financial industry lobbyist. “If you … want to be effective but you don’t want to run for president, then you do what she’s doing.”

Warren is in high demand as a campaign surrogate, and on Monday announced she would spend the final three weeks before the November election visiting some of the nation’s toughest Senate battlegrounds.

The campaign tour will take her to Colorado and Minnesota on behalf of her colleagues Sens. Mark Udall (D-Colo.) and Al Franken (D-Minn.), and Iowa, where she’ll be looking to bolster the candidacy of four-term Rep. Bruce Braley (D-Iowa).

“If doing everything we can for 22 days means we'll be able to spend the next two years pressing forward in our fight to give just a little bit of relief to single moms struggling on minimum wage, or to college students getting crushed with loans, or to women who just want access to birth control, then I'm ready for that fight,” Warren said.

Warren has already visited 15 states to campaign for Democratic Senate and gubernatorial candidates, raising her profile at a time when liberal groups are pleading with her to mount a challenge to Hillary Clinton in 2016.

The senator has repeatedly ruled out a presidential run. Close observers doubt that she would take on Clinton, but they say it’s clear that she’s using her soapbox to try and pull the Democratic Party in a new direction.

“A rising populist tide is sweeping the country, and Elizabeth Warren is the guiding light setting the example for others in the party,” said Laura Friedenbach, spokeswoman for the Progressive Change Campaign Committee. “Warren is right to call out the party's failures to take on Wall Street, and we need more leaders in Congress like Warren who aren't afraid to stand up on behalf of their constituents.”

The latest shot across the bow came over the weekend, when Warren told the liberal media outlet Salon that Obama and his team “protected” Wall Street from the repercussions of the financial crisis.

“He picked his economic team and when the going got tough, his economic team picked Wall Street,” Warren said. “They protected Wall Street. Not families who were losing their homes. Not people who lost their jobs. ... And it happened over and over and over.”

Elsewhere in the interview, Warren credited the president for backing the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau — her signature project before joining the Senate — and said the GOP’s policies are the real problem.

"Democrats have not done all that they should, but at least we’re out there fighting for the right things. We’re fighting and I think trying to pull in the right direction," she said.

Still, Warren is not shy of bucking the tide.

She was among just a handful of Democrats to vote against a bipartisan student loan compromise struck in the summer of 2013, arguing the government was profiting on the backs of struggling students.

Warren was also one of only 10 Democrats to oppose a government funding bill in September that gave Obama power to arm and train Syrian rebels, airing concerns about the U.S. getting involved in another Middle Eastern conflict.

Last fall, Warren was among a group of congressional Democrats who helped scuttle the possible nomination of Larry Summers to head the Federal Reserve.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But while she has broken with party leaders occasionally, Warren has not adopted the pose of outside agitator, instead campaigning and fundraising on behalf of Democratic candidates around the country.

Democrats are well aware of how potent Warren's populist economic message can be with voters, and have embraced it with their "fair shot" agenda for the midterm elections.

Party leaders made Warren the face of one of Senate Democrats' top priorities this year, giving her the lead on a bill that would let borrowers refinance for lower interest rates.

Observers say Warren's outsized role for a freshman has already changed some of the calculus in the Senate, as members are wary of getting on the wrong side of one of her pet issues.

"It impacts how the Senate does things," said the lobbyist. "Getting Elizabeth Warren on board is a very big deal. … You've got to check that box."

The Daily Beast: Sally Kohn: "Warren and Christie Are the Anti-Hillarys"

By Sally Kohn

October 14, 2014

[Subtitle:] Warren hits Obama on Wall Street. Christie tells the right they'll have to live with him as is. Wish Clinton had a little of that moxie.

It's no wonder that despite the obstacle of Bridgegate on the one hand and the Hillary juggernaut on the other, rank-and-file voters across parties remain energized by the prospect of either Chris Christie or Elizabeth Warren running for president. In an era of politicians who are too cautious to take a bold stand on much of anything except for when it comes to the hyperbole of bashing the other party, Christie and Warren seem to be actual human beings—most importantly, ones with actual convictions that they're willing to stand up for, even if it means standing against their own parties. The contrast is even more stark in the context of Hillary Clinton: Elizabeth Warren has forceful policies, Chris Christie a forceful personality, but Hillary Clinton has neither.

In a recent interview with Salon, Warren doubled down on her criticism of President Obama for letting Wall Street off the hook in the wake of the 2008 financial crisis. After Wall Street reckless crashed the entire United States economy, costing millions of Americans their jobs, homes, and savings, the Obama Administration put forward only modest financial reform laws and didn't prosecute a single culpable bank executive.

"[W]hen the going got tough, his economic team picked Wall Street," Warren said. "They protected Wall Street. Not families who were losing their homes. Not people who lost their jobs. Not young people who were struggling to get an education. And it happened over and over and over."

Warren echoed criticism she lobbed at President Obama in her book, A Fighting Chance, in which she cited Obama's lack of action on comprehensive financial reform as a significant "lost opportunity" to hold Wall Street accountable and fix the structures of our economy to make it work for the middle class.

Meanwhile, The New York Times published a story about Chris Christie's awkward courtship of evangelical Republicans. Christie actually siding with the Religious Right on a number of fundamental issues is somehow insufficient, the article accounts: "Although they are drawn to Mr. Christie's bumptious style, and believe that his opposition to abortion, their chief priority, is deep-seated, they feel he has crossed them on pivotal issues and at key moments."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In other words, although anyone markedly more socially conservative than Christie stands no realistic chance of being elected President of the United States of America as the electorate becomes even more socially liberal, the right of the right is so damned determined to police the borders of its increasingly irrelevant influence that it is eschewing Christie for not being right wing enough.

Christie's attitude? According to the Times, "Asked about the depth of his conservatism this spring, Mr. Christie replied, 'I just act like myself and people take it or leave it, and I'm completely content with that.'" It's the sort of attitude that, I'll confess, makes Christie hard to dislike—in spite of all his anti-teacher, anti-gay, anti-woman policies. And it's the sort of attitude that has allowed him even still be toying with the presidency despite a year of seemingly disqualifying bad headlines.

Contrast both Warren and Christie with Clinton, the heir-apparent to the presidency as far as all the polls (PDF) so far are concerned. Clinton is cautious politically—trying, for instance, in her rhetoric to nod to the economic populism of the day while maintaining her allegiances to Wall Street. Or talking tough on foreign policy while trying to obscure the depths of a pro-war hawkishness for which voters simply don't have an appetite.

And it doesn't help that Clinton is also stylistically cautious—that every sentence she produces seems like a dehydrated piece of fruit that's then been chewed up and spit out by three focus groups before being spoon fed in its final bland and listless form to the American public. Sure, it's easy to get excited about the idea of Hillary Clinton—pioneering political figure who would break the ultimate glass ceiling if elected. But Hillary Clinton herself just ain't exciting.

The tide of politics would seem to be leaving a Clinton-type behind as we as a nation become more hyper-partisan and simultaneously more fixated on big personality-driven characters, from real housewives to TV anchors to the candidates for whom we vote. And yet just like Mitt Romney survived (for a while) by being the last guy standing, Clinton may win out through simple endurance in spite of all her counter-cultural downsides. Then again, Mitt Romney's primary opponents were perhaps a uniquely unqualified group of self-destructive yahoos.

Christie and Warren are real threats to Clinton both in real political terms, as potential opponents, but also conceptually in that their political talent spotlights Clinton's deficiency. Odds are that Warren won't run in 2016, but that she will wisely use the enthusiasm around her gift for authentically connecting with the populist outrage of voters to push an agenda with both Obama and Clinton, hopefully successfully nudging both further to the left—away from big business and Wall Street and toward middle class accountability.

On the other hand, Chris Christie will probably run—and the fact is that if he manages to survive the Republican primary process, even though the majority of American would side with Hillary Clinton especially on social policy (Christie is indeed far to the right of most voters), he would still pose a significant challenge because of his more winning personality. Without any real challengers, Clinton may be able to pull off looking populist and popular enough—but when the race gears up, the strengths of other candidates will simply emphasize her weaknesses.

Washington Post: "Can't quit Mitt: Friends say Romney feels nudge to consider a 2016 presidential run"

By Philip Rucker and Robert Costa

October 13, 2014, 5:10 p.m. EDT

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa — Officially, Mitt Romney returned to Iowa, the quadrennial presidential proving ground, to give a boost to Joni Ernst. But at a closed-door breakfast fundraiser here Monday, the first question from a donor had nothing to do with Ernst's Senate campaign.

"When you get elected to the Senate, your job should be to convince Mitt Romney to run for president again," a donor told Ernst, according to several attendees. The Republican candidate said she would, while Romney laughed.

When Romney and Ernst gathered in a West Des Moines boardroom with about 40 agriculture executives Sunday night, one businessman after another pleaded with Romney to give the White House another shot.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And at a rally for Ernst in Cedar Rapids on Monday, the state legislator who introduced Romney said, "If his address was 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, I would sleep a lot better." After Romney and Ernst finished speaking, some activists chanted, "Run, Mitt, run!"

Romney, the 2012 GOP presidential nominee and now the tacit head of the Republican Party, visited Iowa as part of a feverish nationwide tour designed to help the GOP take control of the Senate. He has insisted that he is not interested in running for president a third time. But his friends said a flurry of behind-the-scenes activity is nudging him to more seriously consider it.

Romney has huddled with prominent donors and reconnected with supporters in key states in recent months. Because of the vacuum of power within his party and the lack of a clear 2016 front-runner, confidants said Romney is grappling with this question: If drafted, would he answer the party's call?

Further juicing the speculation was a Des Moines Register-Bloomberg News poll released over the weekend showing that Romney is the only potential 2016 candidate who would beat Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) among likely Iowa voters, 44 percent to 43 percent.

People in Romney's vast political orbit who are waiting and wishing on him to launch another campaign said Romney has done little to quiet them and has been hazy about his plans following next month's midterm elections.

Former Minnesota governor Tim Pawlenty (R), who briefly ran against Romney in 2012 before becoming a close ally, said he wants to see Romney give it another go.

"There is a feeling that the country missed out on an exceptional president," Pawlenty said. "If he runs, I believe he could win the nomination and the general election. It'd be the right person at the right time, and I would encourage him to do it."

Pawlenty noted that Ronald Reagan ran unsuccessfully for president twice before being elected in his third attempt "and was stronger for it." In contrast with Romney, Pawlenty said, "the emerging class of Republican candidates is untested and unproven."

Within Romney's political network, there has been informal chatter about a third run since early 2013, according to people familiar with the discussions. It bubbled up in phone calls and at dinners and has gained steam this year. Requests continue to pour in for him to appear on the campaign trail, and advisers said he is eager to mount a multi-state fly-around swing beforeNov. 4.

In Iowa, however, Romney seemed uncomfortable with the 2016 talk. At the West Des Moines rally, he spoke for only five minutes, criticizing President Obama on income inequality, foreign affairs and other issues. When reporters tried to question him afterward, he sneaked into a dark maze of cubicles.

He also said that now that he was no longer a candidate, he had a joke to share involving Obama, golfer Phil Mickelson and tennis great Andre Agassi.

As Romney told it, Obama shows up at a bank to cash a check without his ID. The teller asks him to prove who he is, saying that Mickelson proved his identity by hitting a golf ball into a cup and Agassi proved his by hitting a tennis ball at a target. "Is there anything you can do to prove who you are?" the teller asks.

"I don't have a clue," Obama replies in the joke.

The crowd ate it up.

Former aides and senior Republicans say Romney appreciates the GOP masses crowing that he was right about issues such as Russia and health care. But what really intrigues him, they said, are the vulnerabilities among top-tier candidates in the Republican field. If Romney moves toward a race, it would be because he sees a path to victory.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s the market pulling him,” said Kent Lucken, a longtime friend and adviser who accompanied Romney to Iowa. “People look at Hillary as the likely Democratic nominee, and the party needs a strong leader who can stand up to her and who’s been through the process.”

Romney is returning to Boston on Tuesday for a dinner that he and his wife, Ann, are hosting for former campaign advisers and business associates. The event — to benefit neurological research at Brigham and Women’s Hospital — has Romney intimates abuzz.

Save-the-date notices have gone out for the third annual Romney policy retreat in Park City, Utah, in June 2015 — a signal that he wants a platform to promote his issues as the presidential primary campaign season gets underway.

Romney is also mingling privately with top donors who could fund a third campaign. Romney visited Sept. 23 with Joe Ricketts, a billionaire investor who finances the Ending Spending super PAC, at Ricketts’s palatial penthouse apartment covering the entire 78th floor of the Time Warner Center in New York.

On Oct. 6, Romney also took part in a GOP fundraising dinner at the Manhattan apartment of Woody Johnson, the New York Jets owner and former Romney campaign finance chairman. Several 2016 hopefuls gave presentations to the donors, while Romney served as a co-host and made no pitch.

At Johnson’s home, Romney and media magnate Rupert Murdoch spoke about Romney’s political future. According to two Romney allies familiar with the conversation, Romney was cagey with Murdoch but expressed concerns about the developing GOP field. Romney told Murdoch that he felt uneasy about the party’s non-interventionist drift on foreign policy and the base’s embrace of ideological hard-liners.

Many Romney boosters believe that his window of opportunity will be in mid- to late 2015, should Sens. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) or Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) ascend and party establishment types turn to Romney as a savior.

If former Florida governor Jeb Bush (R) opts out of a campaign, “there is going to be more pressure on Mitt to go,” said Tom Rath, an influential New Hampshire Republican.

At a luncheon this month in Atlanta to help GOP Senate nominee David Perdue, “people sat up and paid attention” to Romney, said Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.). “I pulled him aside afterward to thank him for coming. He said he’s not running, and I take him at his word. But I don’t think the door is entirely closed, and circumstances can change.”

That phrase — “circumstances can change” — has been repeated by many Romney backers since the former nominee used it to describe his own thinking about 2016 in a radio interview last month with Hugh Hewitt.

Spencer Zwick, Romney’s former national finance chairman, talks regularly with Romney and said he has been receiving daily calls from donors and other supporters. “There are still plenty of donors who hope circumstances will change and there will be an opportunity for Romney to run again,” he said.

Zwick is part of a slimmed-down inner circle, including longtime advisers Beth Myers, Peter Flaherty, Stuart Stevens, Lanhee Chen and aides Kelli Harrison and Matt Waldrip, who are advising Romney on political activities this fall.

Romney traveled through Iowa with three trusted advisers and friends: David Kochel, Ron Kaufman and Lucken. He also reunited with supporters from campaigns past. In Cedar Rapids, Romney spotted Jim Wilson, a Virginia man who logged more than 40,000 miles chasing the GOP nominee from coast to coast in his campaign-festooned GMC pickup. The two hugged. “You son of a gun,” Romney said.

Another fan, Gary Chidester, 64, came to the West Des Moines rally with a full coterie of Romney paraphernalia for the former candidate to autograph: campaign placards, enlarged photographs and buttons of Mitt and wife Ann, and paperback and audio copies of Romney’s book “No Apology.” He also held a framed drawing that a friend gave him of a black cruise ship named Obama sinking into the sea and a white ship named Romney with the caption, “We’re here to save you.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“He’s the only qualified person to run this time,” Chidester said. “Mitt is a business genius. That’s why I’ve listened to this tape three times. He had it all down — he had Russia down, he had the debt down — and all the other Republicans are novices by comparison.”

CNN: “How many ways can Romney say no to 2016?”

By Ashley Killough

June 23, 2014, 12:08 p.m. EDT

With no clear frontrunner or obvious "next-in-line" candidate in the field of potential 2016 GOPpresidential contenders, Mitt Romney keeps getting asked if he's thinking about throwing his hat in the ring one more time.

But it's not entirely a far-fetched question.

A poll of New Hampshire Republicans and independents who lean that way found that Romney would be the 2016 frontrunner if he decided to run.

The 2012 GOP nominee has done little to stay out of the limelight, especially this year, as he gets involved in numerous races — including GOP primaries — and keeps up a fairly regular routine of media appearances.

He has assumed a sort of party elder role, and just finished hosting close to 300 major donors and politicians at his third annual Park City retreat.

He was asked as recently as last week on "Meet the Press" if he would still turn down another presidential bid -- even if drafted.

The former Massachusetts governor has been accused of flip-flopping in the past, but he's been pretty consistent on his future: He's a "no."

1. "I'm not running, and talk of a draft is kind of silly."

-- June 15, 2014, on NBC's "Meet the Press"

Sarah Palin Doesn't Get Terrorism
Posted by Patrick Barry

Sarah Palin said that Barack Obama isn't equipped to deal with the threat of nuclear terrorism, but in the only state where there are both terrorists and nuclear weapons, John McCain is the candidate who doesn't want to be bothered:

"I'm not going to go there ... because Pakistan is a sovereign nation."

Subject:	Clinton Foundation News & Guidance 8/7/15

Good afternoon! We wanted to give you updates on recent events, Foundation work, and announcements in the news this week.

A recent article in Nonprofit Quarterly describes how the Clinton Foundation operates and the perils of misunderstanding philanthropy. It refutes a Wall Street Journal opinion piece in which the editors conflate the Clinton Foundation, a nonprofit whose staff works on the ground around the world to implement its programs, with the Clinton Family Foundation, a private foundation and the vehicle through which the Clintons direct their personal money to charitable causes of their choice, including the Clinton Foundation.

> "The errors in the WSJ editorial are indicative of how much misunderstanding there is in the media as well as the general public about how the nonprofit sector works from a tax and regulatory perspective. The editorial also demonstrates the potential for damage such ignorance may cause for the sector as well as for well-known donors."

Similarly, Media Matters provided clarity on the Clinton Foundation's role as a public charity.

> A Wall Street Journal editorial conflated the public charity known as the Clinton Foundation with the private, personal Clinton Family Foundation in a misleading attack on Hillary Clinton's charitable giving -- and their misinformation made its way straight to Fox News primetime.
> Donating to their own internationally-renowned public charity seems like a logical thing the Clintons would do -- the fact is much of the Clintons' contributions also went to a variety of other charities, through their private Family Foundation.

Devex wrote about the Foundation's trip to Haiti and how the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership is helping Haitian women entrepreneurs with the innovative Chakipi model.

> CGE Partnership, which creates social enterprises through impact investing in the developing world, has three enterprise models: supply chain enterprise, training enterprise and distribution enterprise.
> "It's just a very powerful model," Chuck Slaughter, the founder and CEO of Living Goods, told Devex. "It works everywhere. It crosses every political, geographic, economic, social context, with relatively little modification."
> The Clinton Foundation has the clout to connect and convene diverse partners, coupled with a huge budget that is only growing.

Share this article on Twitter here: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/628671798687744000

In addition to Nonprofit Quarterly, several philanthropy-centric news outlets have commended the Foundation and discussed our life changing work. Inside Philanthropy wrote about economic growth in Appalachia:

> At the latest Clinton Global Initiative, former President Bill Clinton announced the first-round investment closing of Appalachian Community Capital, with a lead investment of $3.45 million coming from [Appalachia Regional Commission].

Share this article on Twitter here: https://twitter.com/InsidePhilanthr/status/629428017199230976

Patrick Welsh, who joined the Clinton Foundation's delegation trip to Africa, penned an op-ed about the Foundation's global, life-changing work and how it inspires him to make positive change in his home state of Mississippi.

> The initiatives supported by the foundation alter the lives of individuals, communities, nations and the world in immeasurable, positive ways. Experiencing these actions first hand instilled a strong sense of pride in the former first family, the foundation supporters and the United States.
> Seeing all the great changes taking place in Africa's developing nations inspired me, because we have the same potential here.

Share this article on Twitter here: https://twitter.com/clarionledger/status/627624125989675008

Finally, a piece in Accounting Today explained the difficulties surrounding charity evaluator ratings and how Charity Navigator couldn't rate the Foundation simply because they "cannot account for the charity's model with its methodology."

Hope you have a great weekend!

Subject: [big campaign] McCain More Conservative Than Bush

July 26, 2008
Bush and McCain Seem to Diverge in Foreign Policy
By ELISABETH BUMILLER

WASHINGTON — President Bush and Senator John McCain have long been in agreement on major elements of American foreign policy, particularly in their approach to the “axis of evil” countries of Iran and North Korea, and their commitment to staying the course in Iraq.

But now the administration’s agreement to consider a “time horizon” for troop withdrawals from Iraq has moved it, at least in the public perception, in the direction of the policies of Senator Barack Obama. That has thrown Mr. McCain on the political defensive in his opposition to a timed withdrawal, Republicans in the party’s foreign party establishment say.

On Friday Mr. McCain went so far as to say that the idea of a 16-month withdrawal, which Mr. Obama supports, was “a pretty good timetable,” although he included the caveat that it had to be based on conditions on the ground.

Similarly, Republicans say that the administration’s decision to authorize high-level talks with Iran and North Korea has undercut Mr. McCain’s skepticism about engagement with those two countries, leaving the perception that he is more conservative than Mr. Bush on the issue.

Essentially, as the Bush administration has taken a more pragmatic approach to foreign policy, the decision of Mr. McCain, of Arizona, to adhere to his more hawkish positions illustrates the continuing influence of neoconservatives on his thinking even as they are losing clout within the administration.

Whether the perception of Mr. McCain as being at odds with the administration is politically advantageous for him is a matter of debate among his supporters, but many of his more conservative advisers do not think it is a bad thing.

“There’s no doubt, particularly as Bush has adopted policies in the direction of Obama, that that gives Obama bragging rights,” said John R. Bolton, the Bush administration’s former ambassador to the United Nations, who has sharply criticized the administration’s talks with Iran and North Korea. “But if you believe as I do that this administration is in the midst of an intellectual collapse, it doesn’t hurt McCain. Occasionally in politics it helps to be right.”

But other Republicans — the so-called foreign policy pragmatists, many of whom have come to view the Iraq war as a mistake — say the policy shifts by the administration highlight the more confrontational nature of Mr. McCain’s foreign policy, particularly in his approach toward Russia and his embrace on Friday of the Dalai Lama, whom the Chinese regard as the fomenter of a rebellion in Tibet. They say the meeting will only antagonize the Chinese before the Summer Olympics, and at a moment when the United States is seeking that country’s cooperation on economic issues and negotiations with North Korea.

The divisions within the Republican foreign policy establishment continue at a time when Mr. Obama, of Illinois, is trying to establish his own international credentials. Republicans worry that he is seizing the chance, helped with the boost from Mr. Bush, to command the American foreign policy stage.

“Bush and Obama seem to be setting the foreign policy agenda, and McCain seems to be reacting,” said Ken Duberstein, a former chief of staff to President Ronald Reagan.

The McCain campaign disputes the idea that Mr. McCain has been left out on his own by the president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Does he feel he had the rug pulled out from under him by Bush?” said Randy Scheunemann, Mr. McCain’s chief foreign policy aide. “Absolutely not. John McCain has always said that he wanted the troops to come home. But he is opposed to an artificial date-driven timetable that ignores conditions on the ground and the advice of military commanders.”

In fact, Mr. Bush’s decision to accept a “general time horizon” for withdrawal from Iraq is still a long way from Mr. Obama’s proposal for a phased pullout, as the administration has not set any timeline.

Mr. McCain has on several recent occasions envisioned a date by when most American troops in Iraq would leave, although he has refused to call it a timetable. In a speech in Ohio in May, he declared that most American troops would be home by 2013. On Monday, in remarks at the side of the first President George Bush in Kennebunkport, Me., Mr. McCain embraced, if only in passing, the possibility of withdrawing most American troops from Iraq by the end of 2010.

On Friday on CNN, under questioning by Wolf Blitzer, he called Mr. Obama’s 16-month proposal “a pretty good timetable.” But the McCain campaign declined to elaborate Friday night on whether this represented a change in his views.

Mr. McCain’s advisers also say that he is not opposed to talks with Iran and North Korea, and that he supported the administration’s decision to send the under secretary of state, William J. Burns, to Geneva last week for talks with Iran and European officials about Iran’s nuclear program. But Mr. McCain is against any president-to-president negotiations without preconditions that Mr. Obama supports. (Mr. Obama’s advisers now say that the talks would occur only if Mr. Obama deemed them potentially fruitful.)

Mr. McCain’s campaign continues to be a microcosm of the ongoing Republican foreign policy battles between the pragmatists and the neoconservatives like Mr. Bolton, and it is still not clear where the balance of power lies within Mr. McCain’s inner circle. But so far the divide between the two within the campaign does not appear as deep as it did within the Bush White House, and advisers say Mr. McCain has been able to chose when there is a policy difference.

Mr. McCain’s advisers were divided, for example, over a speech he gave on nuclear security policy in Denver in May. Two Republican pragmatists who advise Mr. McCain, the former secretaries of state Henry A. Kissinger and George P. Shultz, supported a call in the speech for a nuclear-free world, an idea they endorse as part of a “Gang of Four” of national security statesmen. But other advisers to Mr. McCain were opposed to the idea because, in their view, nuclear weapons act as a deterrent against an attack on the United States and its allies. In the end, Mr. Lehman said, Mr. McCain made the call in favor of a nuclear-free world.

“He wanted to do it,” John F. Lehman, secretary of the Navy, said. “That position is McCain’s position. It’s not a cabal of Kissingerites or a cabal of neo-cons.”

But a number of Mr. McCain’s pragmatist advisers remain uneasy that conservatives close to Mr. McCain — among them Mr. Scheunemann and Robert Kagan, a scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace — will help Mr. McCain mold a more bellicose message than they would like on Iran and its threat to Israel, particularly at a time when there is widespread speculation in the Israeli news media that Israeli may bomb Iran’s nuclear facilities.

Others who were once uneasy about the influence of conservatives on Mr. McCain say that their worries have not been realized, even as Mr. McCain has taken conservative positions.

“What I’ve seen in the campaign so far to me demonstrates that McCain is his own man, and he’s not being managed,” said Lawrence Eagleburger, a secretary of state under the first President Bush.

Rivals Can No Longer Ignore Donald Trump’s Long Shadow

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Potential supporters lined up outside a town-hall-style meeting with Donald J. Trump in Derry, N.H., on Wednesday. Ian Thomas Jansen-Lonnquist for The New York Times

By Maggie Haberman

Good Friday morning. Even on vacation, President Obama seeks to reassure on-the-fence supporters of the Iran nuclear deal that he will take a hard line in enforcing it. And as Donald J. Trump continues to drive both the polls and the news cycles, the ripples extend to his rivals' camps as they can no longer base their response on simply waiting for him to go away.

As the dust from the first Republican presidential primary debate has settled, one fact has become as glaringly bright and clear as a golden hotel sign: Mr. Trump is not going away.

With the issue of illegal immigration as his energy source, Mr. Trump has not only survived any fallout from the Fox News debate, he has thrived. So Republicans are increasingly forced to find ways to respond, either by acting more like him (such as Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin and Senator Ted Cruz of Texas), or by acknowledging his power but respectfully disagreeing, like Gov. John R. Kasich of Ohio.

Then there's Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor who has seen his poll numbers fall since the debate, and who in the last two days has tried challenging Mr. Trump head-on. But that was after Mr. Trump stuck a rhetorical knife into Mr. Bush's craw, describing him as "low energy" in New Hampshire.

Mr. Trump's emphasis on immigration also took a violent turn in the last two days, as two men were charged in an attack on a homeless Hispanic man in Boston. One of the accused is reported to have cited Mr. Trump's views as an inspiration. Mr. Trump responded by calling his supporters "passionate," but he did not denounce the act.

Where Mr. Trump has a potential vulnerability is with social conservatives, and Mr. Bush has tried to remind people of Mr. Trump's past as an abortion rights-supporting Democrat. But such arguments, or any others, have so far been unable to slow Mr. Trump's mummylike creep forward.

What We're Watching Today

- Americans for Prosperity, which bills itself as "America's largest center-right grass-roots organization" in pursuit of "lower taxes, less government, and an end to Obamacare," is hosting its ninth annual, "Defending the American Dream" meeting this weekend. On Friday, Mr. Bush and Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana will speak, while on Saturday, Mr. Cruz, Rick Perry and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida will have their say.

- Mr. Trump will be in Mobile, Ala., where his venue was changed to a 50,000-seat college football stadium because the demand for tickets eclipsed the previous site's 1,950 seats.

At Large Rally, Cruz Casts a Wide Net for Evangelicals

Mr. Cruz's campaign team likes to talk about the Republican base as fitting into four tournament-style brackets : establishment/moderates, libertarian, Tea Party and evangelicals. While he has never tried to woo establishment voters, Mr. Trump, Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky and others have cut into his support among libertarian and Tea Party voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But among evangelicals, Mr. Cruz has found a solid base, and he has made appeals to that bracket a core element of his campaign, evident in Friday night's "Rally for Religious Liberty" in Des Moines.

The rally, for which the campaign has received over 2,500 R.S.V.P.s as of Wednesday, materialized in the wake of the Supreme Court decision legalizing same-sex marriage, as the campaign read news reports of business owners struggling with the decision — hence the event's billing of "calling attention to the religious persecution of Christian business owners and employees."

Steve Deace, the conservative radio host in Iowa who announced his endorsement of Mr. Cruz on Wednesday , will play M.C., and two well-known Christian music groups will perform: Newsboys – of which Mr. Cruz counts himself a fan – and the Bontrager Family Singers of Kalona, Iowa.

The Cruz campaign's recent extended swing through the Southeast featured stops in churches and a retooled stump speech heavy with messages geared toward the faith community: calls to investigate Planned Parenthood, and, unsurprisingly, calls to "protect religious liberty."

McCaskill Spurns White House Overtures on Path to Back Iran Deal

Most congressional Democrats who have decided their stance on the nuclear accord with Iran – whether for it or against – have boasted about their contacts with the White House, from Mr. Obama on down.

Not Senator Claire McCaskill, Democrat of Missouri, who threw her weight behind the nuclear deal on Thursday.

"The only call I got from the administration was from Susan Rice," Ms. McCaskill said in an interview, referring to the president's national security adviser. "And I told her to leave me alone."

Some people like to be courted.

Next Friday, via live webcast, Mr. Obama is going to court the Board of the Jewish Federations of North America and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, part of his effort to garner support for the deal.

"I did have a long talk with some very senior administration officials, and I mean, very senior, in which I laid out a menu of concerns," said Senator Chris Coons, Democrat of Delaware, who later in the interview let on it had been Mr. Obama and Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr.

But Ms. McCaskill said she wanted to do her research on her own. In particular, she called representatives from each of the six countries that negotiated the deal, as well as the countries that actually hold Iran's frozen assets.

Her conclusion: "The more calls I made the more it became clear to me the new status quo if we reject the deal would be A) a much diminished United States in terms of its ability to influence international policy," she said. "The B) was, it's not clear to me they're not gonna get the money anyway."

Our Favorites From The Times

- Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont has drawn big crowds to his "Political Revolution," speaking to an angry vision of a broken system that requires fundamental change.

- Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, unveiled a plan to expand Social Security, rejecting calls to raise the retirement age for the program, and, like Mr. Sanders, seeking an increase in benefits.

- And in a Quinnipiac University survey of voters in Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania, Mr. Rubio beat Hillary Rodham Clinton in a general election matchup by the widest margins of any Republican presidential candidate.

Carter Offers a Regret From His 'Adventurous, Gratifying Existence'

Former President Jimmy Carter disclosed the extent of his cancer diagnosis on Thursday and said he was at peace with whatever happens given his "exciting and adventurous, gratifying existence." But he did express some regrets, and one was particularly striking.

"I wish I had sent one more helicopter to get the hostages, and we would have rescued them, and I would have been re-elected," Mr. Carter said. He was referring to the failed 1980 Iran hostage rescue mission that ended in disaster in the desert when a helicopter crashed into a transport plane, a debacle often cited as contributing to Mr. Carter's loss to Ronald Reagan.

Besides raising the question of what the world would look like had there been no two-term Reagan presidency, his answer showed that the episode has clearly haunted him through a post-presidency generally considered very successful. The episode has also influenced military and rescue strategy. The specter of the Carter-era hostage failure was cited by several Obama administration officials as the reason Mr. Obama pushed for extra helicopters during the 2011 raid on the Osama bin Laden compound. And they were needed; one crashed while trying to land.

What We're Reading Elsewhere

- The Columbus Dispatch in Ohio takes Mr. Rubio to task for saying, in a speech in Detroit on Thursday, that the Wright Brothers were from Kitty Hawk, N.C., where they made their historic flight in 1903. But they were from Dayton, Ohio. "Ooops," Jack Torry writes in the paper , adding, "Getting things wrong about the Wright Brothers is a real sore point in Dayton, which likes to call itself the birthplace of aviation."

- CBS News looks at how the Black Lives Matter movement is affecting the campaign in both parties.

- CNN investigates the important role that Mr. Cruz's wife plays on the fund-raising front.

- Mr. Paul turns to Bloomberg View to write an op-ed about why he wants more audits of the Federal Reserve.

Petition Seeks a New Gig for an Out-of-Work Jon Stewart

Presidential debates are meant to be serious affairs, but a movement is growing to add some levity to the mix by recruiting Jon Stewart, the recently retired "Daily Show" host, to take a turn as moderator.

Nearly 100,000 people have signed an online petition urging the Commission on Presidential Debates to consider Mr. Stewart for one of the three final debates ahead of the 2016 election. Citing his Peabody Award and his experience interviewing world leaders, the petition suggests, "Choosing Jon Stewart would be a popular choice among voters."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Stewart's presence in front of the debate stage would be a boon for ratings, but his left-leaning reputation could potentially irk a Republican presidential candidate.

If Mr. Trump makes it that far it would be his first time facing off with Mr. Stewart, who called the billionaire a gift from the comedy gods before he signed off from the show.

In a recent interview with The Hollywood Reporter , Mr. Trump said that he had enjoyed overshadowing Mr. Stewart's valedictory broadcast in the ratings with this debate performance on Fox, which drew record viewership. While he claimed to have "no problem" with Mr. Stewart, he did profess a preference for Bill Maher.

Is McCain Like Bush? It Depends on the Issue (NYT 6/17/08)
By ELISABETH BUMILLER
The Democrats like to say that electing Senator John McCain would usher in the third term of George W. Bush, and they do not mean it as a compliment. The Republicans counter that calling the senator "McBush" is political spin and that Mr. McCain is his own man.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Eyes Corporations in Proposals for Economy // NYT // Maggie Haberman - July 24, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton made a case on Friday for weaning Wall Street from an addiction to profits, calling for a change to capital gains taxes for the highest earners and a string of measures to adjust the balance of power between corporate titans and their employees.

She also supported raising the minimum wage for fast-food workers to $15 an hour in New York, where a wage board this week suggested such an increase, but she also insisted that such a rise was not a one-size-fits-all approach for the whole country.

Amid pressure from the left to take a more aggressive approach toward the financial industry, Mrs. Clinton presented her proposals in a speech at New York University, the second major address of her campaign that focused on economic issues. The approach — suggesting, among other things, increasing transparency involving stock buybacks and executive compensation — is her first effort to take on Wall Street, without the gate-rattling that some more liberal elements of the Democratic Party have called for.

While the speech had a Wall Street overlay, it was more broadly about changes to corporate culture. Mrs. Clinton's aides say she plans to give a speech specific to Wall Street in the coming weeks.

Her plans won praise from a key centrist think tank but came under criticism from anti-tax groups and some liberal analysts, who were skeptical about how much change would result.

Among the splashiest ideas was a call to overhaul capital gains taxes imposed on those in the highest income bracket, families making more than $465,000 a year, so that people would hold on to stocks for longer, reducing corporate obsession with quarterly profits. That would encourage companies to focus more on investing in long-term growth and their work forces.

The new rate, along a sliding scale over six years of holding an equity, would increase from 20 percent to nearly 40 percent for investments that taxpayers maintain for one to two years, and would gradually decrease after that, back to 20 percent. The top rate would be the same as the highest tax rate for normal income.

"The current definition of a long-term holding period, just one year, is woefully inadequate," Mrs. Clinton said in the speech, without mentioning the specifics of the plan. "That may count as long-term for my baby granddaughter, but not for the American economy."

She added that businesses needed "to break free from the tyranny of today's earnings report so they can do what they do best: innovate, invest and build tomorrow's prosperity."

Mrs. Clinton's proposal to change capital gains rates for the highest earners is a plan that many of her Wall Street supporters endorse.

But at least some critics on the left raised questions about her overall approach. Len Berman of the Tax Policy Center described himself as “skeptical” about whether it would encourage companies to do more to treat workers as assets.

“The purpose seems to be to encourage companies to make longer-term investments,” he said. “I don’t know that it’ll really accomplish that goal.”

Others praised the plan.

“It was a thoughtful approach to reform that would actually help people, help the middle class, instead of a symbolic thing that might make people feel better but wouldn’t have any impact on people’s lives,” said Matt Bennett, head of the center-left think tank Third Way.

“I think this is a very good-faith effort to find every possible opportunity for government to improve the system, and sometimes that’s going to be marginal, sometimes that’s going to be substantial, but they’re doing their best.”

Mrs. Clinton strongly criticized “quarterly capitalism” and the focus on generating profits for short-term earnings reports.

“A survey of corporate executives found that more than half would hold off making a successful long-term investment if it meant missing a target in the next quarterly earnings report,” Mrs. Clinton said.

“Large public companies now return eight or nine out of every 10 dollars they earn directly back to shareholders, either in the form of dividends or stock buybacks, which can temporarily boost share prices,” she said. “Last year, the total reached a record $900 billion. That doesn’t leave much money to build a new factory or a research lab, or to train workers, or to give them a raise.”

She cited a report that said some Standard & Poor’s companies in the last decade had doubled “the share of cash flow they spent on dividends and stock buybacks” and “actually cut capital expenditures on things like new plants and equipment.”

Dominic Barton, the global managing director of McKinsey & Company, who coined the term “quarterly capitalism,” praised Mrs. Clinton for focusing on “more long-term capitalism, more investment.” But he did not endorse any of her specific prescriptions, and suggested that caution was important in terms of how changes to buybacks and dividends would be addressed.

Hillary Clinton on e-mail controversy: ‘Maybe the heat is getting to everybody’ // WaPo // Jose A. DelReal - July 24, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Friday criticized a news report that indicated the Department of Justice had opened a criminal investigation into whether she "mishandled" and distributed classified information via her private email address while serving as secretary of state.

“I want to say a word about what's in the news today. And it's because there have been a lot of inaccuracies as Congressman Cummings made clear this morning,” Clinton said at the beginning of a speech on the economy in New York. “Maybe the heat is getting to everybody. We all have a responsibility to get this right.”

The New York Times on Thursday published a story indicating that the Justice Department was investigating

Clinton herself. On Friday, as more information became available, the Times issued a correction on the story noting that “the referral addressed the potential compromise of classified information in connection with that personal email account. It did not specifically request an investigation into Mrs. Clinton.”

The former secretary of state’s campaign forcefully pushed back, criticizing the reporting in the Times story and insinuating that the “inaccurate leaks” were politically motivated.

“It is now more clear than ever that the New York Times report claiming there is a criminal inquiry sought in Hillary Clinton's use of email is false. It has now been discredited both by the Justice Department and the Ranking Member of the House Oversight Committee,” said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill in a statement. “This indecent shows the danger of relying on reckless, inaccurate leaks from partisan sources.”

“I have released 55,000 pages of emails. I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House committee. We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right and I will do my part,” Clinton said Friday. “But I’m also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families.”

New York Times issues correction on Clinton email story // CNN // Tom LoBianco - July 24, 2015

The New York Times on Friday afternoon issued a correction to a high-profile story that suggested Hillary Clinton was the focus of a federal criminal investigation surrounding her use of private email -- potentially including classified information -- while leading the State Department.

The decision capped an earlier choice by the Times to walk back a tough lead on the story posted late Thursday -- which said a pair of inspectors general requested a criminal probe into Clinton's alleged sending of classified emails from her personal server. But the paper later backtracked, saying the probe was instead suggested for emails related to Clinton, though it didn't issue a correction until mid-Friday afternoon.

The Times amended its story to read:

"An earlier version of this article and an earlier headline, using information from senior government officials, misstated the nature of the referral to the Justice Department regarding Hillary Clinton's personal email account while she was secretary of state. The referral addressed the potential compromise of classified information in connection with that personal email account. It did not specifically request an investigation into Mrs. Clinton."

The Times' correction capped a day of confusion and some back-and-forth as reporters scrambled to find out precisely what type of probe was requested and whether Clinton had emailed any classified information using her unsecured, personal email server.

On Friday, CNN reported that the inspector general for the intelligence community had informed members of Congress that some material Clinton emailed from her private server contained classified information, but it was not identified that way.

Because it was not identified, it is unclear whether Clinton realized she was potentially compromising classified information.

The move on such a high-profile scoop was immediately panned by critics and the Clinton campaign. Clinton supporters sent around a tweet from former Nevada political writer Jon Ralston saying "This is just so, so dumb."

Friday evening, Eileen M. Murphy, the paper's vice president for corporate communications, told CNN that the paper did not plan to comment beyond the correction.

But one of the reporters, Michael Schmidt, defended the first version of the story on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" Friday morning.

"We made a minor change to the story shortly after it went online that said the investigation was in connection with her email use," Schmidt said. "It didn't really deviate our story much from where we were before."

Schmidt said the Clinton campaign on Thursday, shortly before the story was published, "came at us very strong, and very late, and very forcefully."

Clinton campaign spokesman Nick Merrill issued a statement on Friday that "It is now more clear than ever that The New York Times report claiming there is a criminal inquiry sought in Hillary Clinton's use of email is false."

He added, "This incident shows the danger of relying on reckless, inaccurate leaks from partisan sources."

Clinton on Friday afternoon addressed the controversy before a speech at New York University that focused on the economy.

"First, I want to say a word about what's in the news today. It's because there have been a lot of inaccuracies -- as Congressman (Elijah) Cummings made clear his morning. Maybe the heat is getting to everybody. We all have responsibility to get this right," Clinton said.

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right and I will do my part," Clinton added.

Clinton: The tyranny of quarterly earnings hurts innovation // Wired // Issie Lapowsky - July 24, 2015

HILLARY CLINTON WANTS Wall Street to prize long-term success over short-term gains. And so, during a campaign stop at New York University's Stern School of Business today, the Democratic presidential candidate laid out a series of policy proposals that would encourage businesses to invest in the future.

The first of these changes would be an increase on capital gains taxes on wealthy investors who hold stock for just one or two years. Clinton also vowed to review regulations related to shareholder activity, in an effort to reign in activist investors, who Clinton says place undue pressure on public companies to boost their stock prices. These "hit and run" investors encourage companies to keep employee wages low and only make investments that will yield an immediate return for the next earnings report, Clinton said.

"It is clear the system is out of balance. The deck is stacked in too many ways, and powerful pressures and incentives are pushing it even further out of balance," Clinton said, adding that these policies are "bad for business, bad for wages, and bad for our economy, and fixing it will be good for everyone."

Clinton's criticisms will likely resonate with tech industry executives and venture capitalists within the tech industry who say businesses are facing mounting pressure from large investors seeking quick returns. Silicon Valley companies have faced pressure from activist investors like Carl Icahn, who has pushed Apple take short-term action to boost its stock price. Just this week, chip-maker Qualcomm responded to pressure from investor Jana Partners, announcing it would cut up to 4,500 jobs by the end of 2016. And Icahn was a key instigator of the recent split between eBay and Paypal.

The Problem of "Short-termism"

This "short-termism," as Clinton calls it, is a mindset that tech leaders find tough to grapple with and often blame for their post-IPO struggles. Former Twitter CEO Dick Costolo recently pointed to this practice as one of his chief challenges at Twitter. Meanwhile, prominent venture capitalists like Marc Andreessen have denounced activist investors publicly, saying at a recent Fortune conference, "We're in this kind of mode where public companies are being basically forced by pressure from activists and their investors to give back huge amounts of cash instead of investing it in their business."

This is the type of behavior Clinton hopes to dissuade by instituting policies that would help companies break free of the "tyranny of today's earnings report." That's the thinking behind Clinton's proposal of a capital gains tax increase on families earning $465,000 or more. The hike would tax any gains on stocks sold within the first two years as ordinary income tax. The tax rate would then decrease every year for six years until it returns to the current capital gains rate.

"This means that when investors buy into a company, they'll be more focused on its future growth strategy than its immediate profits," Clinton said.

While this type of urgency in investing is pervasive on the public market, Clinton did point to both Google and SpaceX as examples of companies that still manage to "invest in research that does little for today's bottom line, but may yield transformational benefits down the line."

Throughout, the former Secretary of State pushed for a return to the kind of long-term strategic thinking that yielded breakthrough technologies like the transistor and the PC. "What if Xerox had decided its Palo Alto research park wasn't doing enough to boost share prices in the short term?" Clinton asked. "A young Steve Jobs would never have visited, and the personal computer revolution might not have happened."

Hillary Clinton Email Said to Contain Classified Information // NYT // Michael S. Schmidt and Matt Apuzzo - July 24, 2015

Government investigators have discovered four emails containing what they say is classified information on the personal email account that Hillary Rodham Clinton used as secretary of state, the investigators said in a letter to Congress released on Friday.

Mrs. Clinton, meanwhile, said Friday that she would stay focused on the issues at the heart of her presidential campaign, and that she was concerned about "a lot of inaccuracies" in the reporting of her personal email account.

"Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," she said at a campaign event at New York University.

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part," Mrs. Clinton added. "But I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues, that really matter to American families."

The government investigators discovered the four emails while reviewing a sampling of 40 emails from Ms. Clinton's account. Of those, four contained information that should have been marked classified and should have been sent and stored on a secure computer system, I. Charles McCullough III, the inspector general of the intelligence community, the internal watchdog for the nation's intelligence agencies, said in the letter to Congress.

The emails were routed through a private email server that Mrs. Clinton set up in her home. Critics and security experts have questioned whether the practice made government secrets more vulnerable to security risks and hacking.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton's campaign released a brief statement on Twitter, saying, "Any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted."

The discovery of the four emails has prompted the inspector general to refer the matter to F.B.I. counterintelligence agents, who investigate crimes related to mishandling classified information. On Thursday night and again Friday morning, the Justice Department referred to the matter as a "criminal referral" but later on Friday dropped the word "criminal."

Regardless of the terminology, the referral raises the possibility of a Justice Department criminal investigation into Mrs. Clinton's emails as she campaigns for president. Polls show she is the front-runner for the Democratic nomination by a wide margin.

Justice Department officials said no decision had been made about whether to investigate.

Since Mrs. Clinton's use of a private email account for official State Department business was revealed in March, she has repeatedly said she had no classified information on the account.

State Department officials, however, told the inspector general that the account potentially contained hundreds of classified emails. When Mr. McCullough's investigators performed the spot check of 40 emails, he said, 10 percent contained classified information, he said.

A second inspector general, this one for the State Department, is also investigating the department's handling of Mrs. Clinton's emails. The two inspectors general have sent Congress a series of memos, including one dated June 29 that said Mrs. Clinton's private account contained "hundreds of potentially classified emails." The memo was written to Patrick F. Kennedy, the under secretary of state for management.

At issue are thousands of pages of State Department emails from Mrs. Clinton's private account. Mrs. Clinton has said she used the account because it was more convenient, but it also shielded her correspondence from congressional and Freedom of Information Act requests.

She faced sharp criticism after her use of the account became public, and subsequently said she would ask the State Department to release her emails.

The department is now reviewing some 55,000 pages of emails. A first batch of 3,000 pages was made public on June 30.

In the course of the email review, State Department officials determined that some information in the messages should be retroactively classified. In the 3,000 pages that were released, for example, portions of two dozen emails were redacted because they were upgraded to “classified status.” But none of those were marked as classified at the time Mrs. Clinton handled them.

In a second memo to Mr. Kennedy, sent on July 17, the inspectors general said that at least one email made public by the State Department contained classified information. The inspectors general did not identify the email or reveal its substance.

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Friday will use a speech focused on growing the economy to endorse a $15-an-hour minimum wage proposal for fast-food workers recommended by a New York panel, a person briefed on her plans said.

The remarks from Mrs. Clinton will come in the city where the fast-food workers’ labor effort first started several years ago. A panel created by Gov. Andrew M. Cuomo on Wednesday recommended the change; the increase will occur faster in New York City than other parts of the state because of the higher cost of living there.

Some Democrats are pushing for the federal minimum wage to be raised to $15 an hour, including two other candidates for the party’s presidential nomination: Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator, and Martin O’Malley, the former Maryland governor.

Mrs. Clinton has argued that the national minimum wage of $7.25 an hour needs to be increased, but she has not gone so far as to endorse an increase to $15. Her embrace of the New York recommendation for fast-food workers will be her first endorsement of a $15-per-hour minimum in any context.

In a town hall in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton suggested a nuanced view of the national minimum-wage debate, one that is more localized than a uniform change in federal policy.

“I think part of the reason that the Congress and very strong Democratic supporters of increasing the minimum wage are trying to debate and determine what’s the national floor is because there are different economic environments,” Mrs. Clinton said. “And what you can do in L.A. or in New York may not work in other places.”

1993 Video Reveals a More Impassioned and Direct Hillary Clinton // NYT // Amy Chozick - July 24, 2015

In 1993, with her father on his deathbed, Hillary Rodham Clinton was not yet a two-time presidential candidate. She was not a New York senator or the secretary of state. She was the president’s wife — a first lady who hosted the Easter egg roll and Christmas tree lighting at the White House, in addition to trying to overhaul the health care system.

But a speech Mrs. Clinton gave at the request of Liz Carpenter, the legendary (and legendarily pushy) press secretary of Lady Bird Johnson in Austin, Tex., showed the intellectual and philosophical worldview of a first lady who, for better or worse, was unlike any the country had seen before.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The doctors in Little Rock, Ark., had just taken her father, Hugh Rodham, 82, off life support after he had a stroke weeks earlier. Mrs. Clinton, then 44 years old, traveled to Austin and delivered an unscripted, stream-of-consciousness address about the meaning of life, death and the need to remake civil society.

She does not mention her father by name, but she does quote, at length, Lee Atwater, the Republican strategist who died of cancer at age 40 in 1990. It is one of Mrs. Clinton's most revealing and existential addresses. An aide, Lisa Caputo, called the speech "cathartic."

Twenty-two years later, as I cover Hillary Clinton's second presidential bid, I see her approach each speech with the caution of a seasoned political candidate under the constant microscope of intense media coverage. I asked the University of Texas at Austin to find this never-before-seen video of her 1993 speech from its archives, and when the old VHS footage arrived, I was struck at how uncensored and direct she was then.

Ranking Hillary Clinton's e-mail problems // WaPo // Amber Phillips - July 24, 2015

There's a full-blown battle in Washington as to whether the personal e-mail account Hillary Clinton used while she was Secretary of State contained classified material -- and whether the government is asking for a criminal probe into that information being mishandled.

Here's the bullet-point details (we'll get into more later on):

Inspectors general for the State Department and intelligence agencies like the CIA and FBI sent a letter to Congress on Thursday analyzing whether Clinton sent or received classified information on her private e-mail account.

It's not clear whether she did. The Wall Street Journal says the inspectors general found four cases among 40 e-mails where she sent clearly classified information, despite denying ever having done so.

Congressional Democrats are coming to her rescue, saying the information was classified retroactively after she stepped down as secretary of state.

The New York Times reported the letter also referred to a criminal investigation into the classified information being mishandled. At least one Justice Department official is denying there was ever a referral for such an investigation.

Clinton released a statement Friday afternoon. "Maybe the heat is getting to every body," she said, adding she has released 55,000 pages of e-mails and offered to answer questions about them.

Clinton herself is not implicated in any wrongdoing in any of this, according to the Associated Press.

But headlines with the words "Clinton" "e-mails" and "investigation" are the last thing she needs right now. There's actually a lot going on with regard to her e-mails. Here's a ranking of the probes, possible investigations and reviews of the Clinton e-mails that her campaign is keeping an eye on, ranked in order of from "Keeping them up at night" to "Mildly annoying."

Keeping them up at night

A possible Department of Justice investigation

The New York Times reported Friday that inspectors general for the State Department and intelligence agencies like CIA and FBI have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal probe into whether sensitive information in connection to Clinton's private e-mail account was mishandled.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Justice Department official is denying officials asked for a criminal probe.

Rep. Elijah Cummings (Md.),the ranking Democrat on the congressional committee investigating the 2012 Benghazi terrorist attacks while Clinton was secretary of state, says the inspectors general were merely pointing out that some information in her released e-mails was retroactively considered classified and should be adjusted accordingly.

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal obtained a copy of the letter the inspector general of intelligence agencies sent to Congress on Thursday. According to the Wall Street Journal, the inspector general concluded Clinton did send e-mails on her private account that were considered classified at the time -- at least four in the batch of 40 e-mails the investigators reviewed. (That's 10 percent for you math majors out there.)

All along, Clinton has maintained she did nothing wrong -- she's not the only agency head to use a personal e-mail address solely although she is the first Secretary of State to do it -- and she says she never talked about classified information on her personal account. And, of course, the news of an inspector general request for a criminal investigation could be wrong.

Here's her full statement Friday:

It's clear her team is incredibly frustrated that this is even news -- especially if the New York Times report of a potential investigation turns out to be false. To them, the damage has already been done.

Giving them indigestion

The State Department review -- and steady release -- of 55,000 pages of her e-mails

First, a reminder of how Clinton's use of a private e-mail account and server came to light, summarized by our friends at the Post's Fact Checker, who put together a helpful timeline:

In 2013, a hacker revealed Clinton had used a private e-mail account to conduct at least some official secretary of state business.

In 2014, a congressional investigation into Benghazi asked the State Department to hand over official documents, including Clinton's e-mails, relating to the deadly 2012 attack on U.S. diplomatic compounds in Libya. The State Department realized there were no records of e-mails sent or received on an official State Department e-mail account for Clinton.

In December, Clinton gave the State Department 55,000 pages of printed e-mails, and in March tweeted: "I want the public to see my e-mail. I have asked State to release them. They said they will review them for release as soon as possible."

In a March press conference, she told reporters she turned over 30,490 work-related e-mails to the State Department and deleted 31,830 e-mails she deemed to be personal.

The State Department is currently reviewing those 30,000+ e-mails and, in accordance with a federal judge's ruling, will release batches of them in monthly increments.

The first batch were released in July. They were kind of boring.

But what's giving the Clinton camp heartburn is the judge's ruling that the e-mails have to be released monthly. Clinton would rather have all 30,000+ released at at once, like ripping off a Band-aid. Now, her team must deal with a steady drip drip of monthly headlines, likely right up until the Feb. 1 Iowa caucus -- reminding voters she used a private e-mail account while secretary of state.

Mildly annoying

The (8th) Benghazi investigation in Congress

Yes, you read that right. House Republicans recently set up their eighth special committee to investigate what went wrong -- and whether Clinton did anything wrong -- in the Sept. 11, 2012, attack that killed four Americans, including U.S. Ambassador Chris Stevens.

A June 2014 Gallup Poll found most voters aren't paying attention to this latest investigation (previous investigations found Obama officials, including Clinton, did nothing wrong.)

But Clinton's team can't brush this off as a political sideshow just yet. She has agreed to testify at least once to the committee (date still pending) and a June Washington Post/ABC News poll found 51 percent of Democrats say Benghazi is a legitimate issue for Clinton in 2016.

And the longer news of her e-mails stay in the headlines, it's a safe bet the more scrutiny Republicans and America will give to Clinton.

Hillary Clinton is playing (home state) favorites on the minimum wage // WaPo // Jim Tankersley and Lydia DePillis - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton said a few words about the minimum wage in a wonky economic speech on Friday, and she ended up endorsing a potentially huge disparity in worker pay across state lines.

It just so happens that her new position favors fast-food employees in New York, where she resides, over comparable employees anywhere else in the country - and it could increase the pressure from liberal activists for her to endorse a $15-an-hour minimum wage nationwide.

Here's the rub Clinton walked into: Workers at the Taco Bell in Binghamton, N.Y., are in line for a big raise in the next few years. The crew at the McDonald's in Hallstead, Penn., just 14 miles away, are not. That's because New York appears set to mandate a $15-an-hour minimum wage for fast food workers by 2021. In Pennsylvania, for now at least, similar workers can be paid as little as $7.25 an hour, the federal minimum wage.

If those figures hold, a full-time chalupa-maker in Binghampton would earn more than $31,000 a year -- in a county where the per-capita income is currently less than $25,000 a year. The burger flipper in Pennsylvania would earn about $15,000 a year, in a county with per-capita income just above $24,000 a year. That's a potentially massive difference in earning power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton wants to raise the federal minimum wage, but she hasn't specified by how much.

At an SEIU-sponsored convention of fast food workers in early June, Clinton called in with a message of strong support, saying that more cities need to follow the lead of Los Angeles -- which had only weeks before voted to raise its minimum wage to $15. Some of the workers present took that as an indication that she supported a nationwide $15 wage, too. But in the following days, her campaign walked back those remarks, saying that specific plans would be forthcoming. And last week, she declined to support a $15 wage nationwide.

On Friday, though, she told an audience at NYU that “I agree with New York’s proposal this week to raise fast food workers’ wages to $15 an hour." She described the federal minimum wage as a floor and said cities such as Los Angeles - which recently voted to adopt a $15-an-hour minimum - should be free to set higher ones. In backing New York's move, she cited the high cost of living in Manhattan.

New York's fast-food wage hike, however, won't just apply to expensive cities. It will apply statewide.

So the question for Clinton now is whether low-income workers in low-cost parts of New York should get a larger raise than similar workers in other states -- and why? Put another way, if Clinton is willing to endorse a uniform $15 minimum wage across a diverse state like New York -- where average annual incomes range from $24,835 in Broome County to $62,498 in Manhattan -- why isn't she willing to support it across the country?

Campaign officials did not immediately respond to a request for comment on Friday afternoon. Representatives from the SEIU-backed Fight for $15 declined to comment.

New York Times says there was ‘no factual error’ in Hillary Clinton e-mail referral story // WaPo // Erik Wemple - July 24, 2015

Current New York Times lead: “Two inspectors general have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account Hillary Rodham Clinton used as secretary of state, senior government officials said Thursday.”

Bold text added to highlight passive voice.

The original lead for the story was much the same, but with a key difference. The requests for a criminal investigation “into whether Hillary Rodham Clinton mishandled sensitive government information on a private email account she used as secretary of state,” as reported by Politico’s Dylan Byers.

Bold text added to highlight active voice.

One of the story’s reporters, Michael Schmidt, told Politico, “It was a response to complaints we received from the Clinton camp that we thought were reasonable, and we made them.”

In an e-mail to the Erik Wemple Blog, New York Times spokeswoman Eileen Murphy notes, “As often happens, editors continued to revise this story after initial publication to make it as clear and precise as possible. There was no factual error, so there was no reason for a correction.”

NBC News also appears to have experimented a bit with its wording. Here's a tweet from early in the morning:

And here's the headline currently on the NBC News site:

Criminal Probe Sought Over Hillary Clinton's Email Account

Brian Fallon, press secretary for the Clinton campaign, has been vocal on Twitter today about the sourcing attached to the early accounts:

An Associated Press story this morning, meanwhile, confirms the requests from the Justice Department but notes, "One U.S. official said it was unclear whether classified information was mishandled and the referral doesn't suggest wrongdoing by Clinton herself."

These developments are just the latest step in Clinton's e-mail crisis, which started in March with revelations in the New York Times that she'd used a private e-mail server throughout her time as secretary of state. She said she didn't send classified information on those e-mails and the campaign has insisted that she complied with "appropriate practices." Campaign spokesman Nick Merrill told the AP that e-mails "deemed classified by the administration were done so after the fact, not when they were sent."

UPDATE: We asked Fallon whether he took issue with the New York Times's explanation that there was no factual error to correct. He responded, "Their lede last night has so far been directly contradicted by the Associated Press and via an on-the-record statement from the Ranking Member of the House Oversight Committee." That statement comes from Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.), who has issued a statement saying that the State Department's inspector general "never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage," reads the statement. "Instead, he told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the FOIA review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified."

"This is the latest example in a series of inaccurate leaks to generate false front-page headlines — only to be corrected later," said Cummings.

Justice: Probe sought in Clinton e-mails, but no 'criminal' focus // WaPo // Fred Barbash - July 24, 2015

The Justice Department said Friday that it has been asked to probe the "potential compromise of classified information" in connection with the private e-mail account Hillary Rodham Clinton used while serving as secretary of state.

The statement did not say who sought the investigation but noted that it was "not a criminal referral." Separately, Justice officials said no decision has been made on whether to move forward with the examination of the e-mails — which are already being reviewed by teams led by the State Department.

The comments sought to clarify the status of the request following a series of accounts. The New York Times first reported Thursday that the inspectors general of the State Department and the intelligence agencies had asked for a criminal investigation related to Clinton's e-mail account. Justice officials later confirmed to The Washington Post that a criminal probe was under consideration.

Then the Justice Department statement answered one question, but left another open. It said a "referral" was made, although it did not say who originated it. “It is not a criminal referral,” the statement said.

Clinton’s use of a private e-mail account was revealed in March. She set up an exclusive and private e-mail server for all of her departmental communications, but she has said she did not use it for classified information.

The State Department is currently reviewing some 55,000 pages of e-mails. About 3,000 have been made public so far, many of them with redactions that might indicate the presence of sensitive, if not classified, information.

Hillary Clinton’s presidential campaign did not offer any comment Thursday night on the Times report.

This is Hillary Clinton’s Elizabeth Warren moment // WaPo // Max Ehrenfreud - July 24, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton will voice a far-reaching critique of the financial sector in a speech Friday, a major victory for Wall Street's critics.

The stock market, she will say, has become short-sighted, focused on measures of quarterly performance rather than the future viability of American corporations, according to aides. She'll describe worrisome consequences for investors, employees and the economy as a whole.

"Everything’s focused on the next earnings report or the short-term share price. The result is too little attention on the sources of long-term growth: research and development, physical capital, and talent," the former secretary of state said last week, previewing the theme of Friday's speech.

"It's easy to try to cut costs by holding down or decreasing pay and other investments to inflate quarterly stock prices, but I would argue that’s bad for business in the long run."

For decades, some economists and experts on the stock market have been saying that corporations place too much emphasis on generating cash in the short term for shareholders. These critics have warned that firms are passing up opportunities to train their employees, conduct research, or build new factories -- investments that would benefit shareholders and workers alike, but only over the long term.

It's easy to miss how radical this argument is, since many wealthy investors are making it, too. Yet this reasoning implies that some of Wall Street's basic assumptions are mistaken.

The financial sector operates on the principle that stock prices accurately reflect how much a company is worth, and that if share prices increase, then chief executive officers are doing their job well.

In an ideally functioning stock market, investors would buy up shares in the companies that were making wise investments for the long term, increasing share prices and rewarding more farseeing corporate leaders. They wouldn't have any reason to focus on the short term.

Yet critics say that in practice, investors are far from infallible, and they often can't distinguish between temporary factors and a stock's enduring, fundamental value.

"There is a growing consensus that at least for some firms, this is a problem," said Joan Farre-Mensa, an economist at Harvard Business School and part of a group that has studied decisions about investment in public firms.

He and his colleagues found that privately held firms invested at more than twice the rate of publicly traded companies, suggesting that pressure from Wall Street restrains investment.

The critique is a familiar one. Politicians such as Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) have aired these concerns before. Yet now Clinton is making what she calls "quarterly capitalism" part of the presidential campaign, nailing down the issue as a central plank in her economic platform.

Jared Bernstein, a former chief economist to Vice President Biden, argues that short-termism isn't just a problem for the financial industry. He and others believe that greater corporate investment could improve the economy as a whole and reduce inequalities of income.

Companies that spend money on training their workers improve those workers' wages over the long term. If they buy new equipment, they create opportunities for their suppliers and, in turn, their suppliers' employees. Dividends and share repurchases, by contrast, mainly benefit the wealthy investors who own stock.

"We're arguing about the game being rigged on behalf of the wealthy," said Bernstein, who wrote about Clinton's proposals on his blog.

Among them is a plan to alter the taxation of capital gains in ways that she hopes will encourage investors and corporate managers to take a longer view.

Currently, gains on investments held for less than a year are taxed as ordinary income, and at a lower rate if they're held for a longer period. Clinton is expected to propose raising the rate on taxes held for an intermediate period, from one year to a few years.

It's an idea that dates at least to an Aspen Institute committee, which issued a statement on the subject in 2009.

"The short-termers can come in and take a position that harms the company in the long term but produces short term benefits," said Lynn Stout, a law professor at Cornell University and a member of that committee. "If the market were perfectly efficient these short term tricks wouldn’t work, but nobody thinks the market is perfectly efficient any more."

Yet she said that changing the capital gains tax would have a limited effect on many of the most influential investors on Wall Street -- the big players that critics blame for the financial sector's focus on the short term.

Consider a hedge fund that takes a large position in a firm and then lobbies its leaders to sell assets and buy back shares, raising the price of the stock. The fund is likely managing the money for major investors such as university endowments and pension funds that are exempt from taxation.

"For most of the big companies, the big shareholders are institutions, who as far as I know are unaffected by this proposal," said Steven Balsam, an accounting professor at Temple University.

The same could be true of mutual funds if their customers are largely small-time investors saving for retirement in a 401(k) account.

Short-termism is a problem, Balsam said, but he added, "We're not in a perfect world, and I don't know that any of the proposed cures won't make the problem worse."

Harvard's Farre-Mensa worried that by increasing taxes on capital gains in the medium term, Clinton's proposal would discourage investment overall as well as investment for the short-term.

"You might be ending up with a bunch of unintended consequences," he said.

There is some debate among economists about the relationship between capital gains taxation and investment. Bernstein does not believe that capital gains taxation has much effect on what people do with their money, and he doesn't think Clinton's proposal would drive people out of the stock market. Yet for the same reason, he said the plan might not discourage short-term bets, either.

"Certainly she's creating incentives that nudge things in the right direction, but I don't think I'd expect a big change in the investment outlook," Bernstein said. "More needs to be done."

Bryon Tau - July 24, 2015

An internal government review found that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton sent at least four emails from her personal account containing classified information during her time heading the State Department.

In a letter to members of Congress on Thursday, the inspector general of the intelligence community concluded that Mrs. Clinton's email contains material from the intelligence community that should have been considered "secret"—the second-highest level of classification—at the time it was sent. A copy of the letter to Congress was provided to The Wall Street Journal by a spokeswoman for the inspector general.

As a result of the findings, the inspector general referred the matter to the Federal Bureau of Investigation's counterintelligence division. An official with the Department of Justice said Friday that it had received a referral to open an investigation into the potential mishandling of classified information. Initially, a Justice Department official said Friday morning the investigation was criminal in nature, but the department reversed course hours later without explanation.

"The department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information. It is not a criminal referral," an official said.

The four emails in question "were classified when they were sent and are classified now," said Andrea Williams, a spokeswoman for the inspector general. The inspector general reviewed just a small sample totaling about 40 emails in Mrs. Clinton's inbox—meaning that many more in the trove of more than 30,000 may contain potentially confidential, secret or top-secret information.

The inspector general's office concluded that Mrs. Clinton should have used a secure network to transmit the emails in question—rather than her personal email account run off a home server.

"None of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings, but some included IC-derived classified information and should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked, and transmitted via a secure network," wrote Inspector General I. Charles McCullough in the letter to Congress.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The emails in question left government custody and are on both Mrs. Clinton's personal home email sever as well as a thumb drive of David Kendall, Mrs. Clinton's personal attorney.

Mrs. Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, said on Friday in New York that there were "inaccuracies" in reports about her email usage, but didn't offer specifics. She noted that she has voluntarily released 55,000 pages of email and offered to testify before a congressional committee.

"Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," Mrs. Clinton said, adding: "We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part. But I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

The State Department said on Friday that it didn't believe any of the emails Mrs. Clinton sent during her time in office contained any classified material.

"To our knowledge, none of them needed to be classified at the time," said Mark Toner, a department spokesman. Mr. Toner acknowledged that the department had determined that many of her emails now contained classified information but believed it was unclassified at the time.

The State Department has downplayed concerns about the classified material found in Mrs. Clinton's 55,000 pages of email—saying that email is often classified after it has been sent.

"It's not uncommon that something that you're sending now on an unclassified network could in later years or later months be deemed to be classified either because the passage of time made it so or because events on the ground have borne out," a State Department spokesman said earlier this month.

Those 55,000 pages are being reviewed for public release. In one instance, classified information has already been released to the public, the inspector general found.

Hillary Clinton Proposes Sharp Rise in Some Capital-Gains Tax Rates // WSJ // Laura Meckler - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Friday proposed a sharp increase in the capital-gains tax rate for the highest earners on investments held only a few years, part of a broader effort to shift corporate America's focus from short-term gain to long-term investment.

"American business needs to break free from the tyranny of today's earning report so they can do what they do best: innovate, invest and build tomorrow's prosperity," the Democratic presidential front-runner said in a speech in New York. "It's time to start measuring value in terms of years—or the next decade—not just next quarter."

Under the Clinton plan, investments held between one and two years would be taxed at the normal income-tax rate of 39.6%, nearly double the existing 20% capital-gains rate. Neither figure counts an extra 3.8% tax on net investment income included as part of the health-care law, a campaign official said.

The campaign's proposal would affect only the top 0.5% of taxpayers. In 2015, the top bracket takes effect above $464,850 of taxable income for married couples filing jointly and $411,500 for single filers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The rate for top-bracket taxpayers would be set on a sliding scale, with the lowest rate applied to investments held the longest. To qualify for the current 20% rate, one would have to hold an investment for at least six years.

Mrs. Clinton, a former secretary of state and U.S. senator from New York, laid out in her speech what she sees as unhealthy corporate efforts to boost stock prices. She argued that a focus on short-term results undercuts longer-term economic growth and hurts American workers.

“Most CEOs are simply responding to very real pressures from shareholders and the market to turn in good quarterly numbers,” she said. “It is clear that the system is out of balance.”

She called for greater disclosure of stock buybacks by companies, saying that while they may give a quick lift to stock prices, they often come at the expense of research-and-development spending. She also called for a review of securities rules related to shareholder activism and rules governing tax treatment of executive compensation.

Some shareholder activists press for positive changes in management or for social responsibility, she said, but others are “hit-and-run” bullies who only want a quick payout.

To boost workers and their pay, she said she would fight for worker rights and encourage companies to invest in training, such as with an apprenticeship tax credit she already put forward. Mrs. Clinton also endorsed a proposed $15-an-hour minimum wage for fast-food workers in New York, saying the cost of living in a place like Manhattan is higher than elsewhere.

She added that politicians in Washington shouldn’t make the problems worse with budget showdowns and government shutdowns, and said what companies want most from the government is predictability.

The capital-gains tax changes are the centerpiece of her proposal. Campaign advisers say their goal is chiefly to change investor behavior, not to address income inequality or to raise money for the federal Treasury. One adviser said the campaign has no estimate as to how much money the changes would generate for federal coffers.

Under existing law, investments held for less than a year are already taxed at normal income-tax rates, and that wouldn’t change under the Clinton plan.

But her plan would affect taxes for the top-tier taxpayers who hold investments for anywhere between two and six years. For instance, investments held for two to three years would be taxed at 36%; those held three to four years would face a tax of 32%. The sliding scale ends at six years.

Some economists and many Republicans argue there is little the government can do to change corporate behavior. Republican presidential contenders by and large want to go in the opposite direction by eliminating taxes on investment income or at least reducing them.

Hillary Clinton to Propose Doubling Capital Gains Tax Rate on Short-Term Investments // WSJ // Laura Meckler - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton will propose a sharp increase in the capital-gains tax rate for the highest earners for investments held only a few years, a campaign official said Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Under the Clinton plan, investments held between one and two years would be taxed at the normal income-tax rate of 39.6%, nearly double the existing 20% capital gains rate. Neither figure counts an extra 3.8% tax on net investment income included as part of the health-care law, a campaign official said.

The campaign's proposal would affect only the top 0.5% of taxpayers, hitting top-bracket single filers with taxable income above $413,201 and married couples filing jointly with taxable income above $484,850.

The rate for top-bracket taxpayers would be set on a sliding scale, with the lowest rate applied to investments held the longest. To qualify for the existing 20% rate, one would have to hold an investment for at least six years.

Mrs. Clinton will lay out the plan in a speech Friday in New York City, where she plans to spotlight what she sees as unhealthy corporate efforts to boost stock prices. She will argue that a focus on short-term results is undercutting longer-term economic growth and hurting American workers.

Mrs. Clinton will also endorse a $15 per hour minimum wage proposal for fast-food workers in New York, a campaign official said. Asked about this on Thursday, she hedged as to whether the minimum wage should be that high nationally but said certain cities can justify higher minimums. "I do recognize that the cost of living in Little Rock is different than the cost of living in Manhattan," she told reporters. Asked if $15 per hour is justified in New York, she said, "That's up to local leaders in New York. They certainly believe it is."

The campaign said she would also call for greater disclosure of stock buybacks by companies, saying that while they may give a quick lift to stock prices, they often come at the expense of research and development spending. She will also call for a review of securities rules related to shareholder activism and rules governing tax treatment of executive compensation.

The capital-gains tax changes are the centerpiece of her proposal. Campaign officials have said that their goal is not to address income inequality or to raise money for the federal treasury, but to change investor behavior.

Under existing law, investments held for less than a year are already taxed at normal income-tax rates, and that wouldn't change under the Clinton plan.

But her plan would affect taxes for the top-tier taxpayers who hold investments for anywhere between two and six years. For instance, investments held for two to three years would be taxed at 36%; those held three to four years would face a tax of 32%. The sliding scale ends at six years.

Her campaign labeled the short-term focus "the tyranny of today's earnings report" in its preview of the speech. The change in the capital-gains tax rates are meant to focus investors and corporations for the long term.

"Clinton will acknowledge that these changes to the tax code alone will not shift investors' focus from short-term to long-term overnight," the campaign said in previewing the speech. "But she believes this reform is a strong first step toward removing some of the incentives pushing us toward short-termism, and aligning investment toward long-term value."

Some economists and many Republicans argue there is little the government can do to change corporate behavior. Republican presidential contenders by and large want to go in the opposite direction by eliminating taxes on investment income or at least reducing them.

Campaigning in Greenville, S.C., on Thursday, Mrs. Clinton was asked how she thought her ideas on corporate America will be received. She declined to speculate but said: “I’m proposing policies that will make our economy stronger, that will promote both strong growth and fair growth but will do so with a longer-term perspective. That’s what I think is best for the country. I think it’s also best for business whether they agree with it or not.”

Her speech Friday is meant to explain how short-term outlooks helped produce near-record high profits but stagnant wages. The campaign cited studies showing that companies that increase spending on stock buybacks, sometimes in an effort to boost the share price, also cut spending on things such as new plants and equipment.

Mrs. Clinton plans to extol both the virtues and risks of shareholder activism, but it was unclear if her speech would ask for anything beyond a review of securities rules. The campaign said shareholder activists can often push a company to improve its operations, but can also pressure management to embrace measures that boost short-term stock performance at the expense of long-term growth.

On stock buybacks, the campaign noted that some countries require daily disclosures, whereas the U.S. mandates it only on a quarterly basis. She will call for greater disclosure in the U.S.

Clinton says nation's companies need to think long-term // AP // Ken Thomas - July 24, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton said Friday that businesses need to "break free from the tyranny" of focusing too closely on quarterly earnings reports and take a longer view of the economy to boost wages.

The Democratic presidential frontrunner said she would seek to change the tax structure by raising capital gains taxes while also reviewing executive compensation rules and addressing shareholder activism that often encourages companies to focus on short-term profits.

"It is clear that the system is out of balance," Clinton said at New York University's Stern School of Business. "The deck is stacked in too many ways and powerful pressures and incentives are pushing it even further out of balance,"

Clinton's speech on economic growth and fairness offered some of her most detailed prescriptions for the economy as a presidential candidate. But much of it was overshadowed by fresh reports that federal investigators had asked the Justice Department to look into whether classified or sensitive government information had been transmitted from Clinton's personal email server while she served as secretary of state.

Clinton said at the outset that there had been "a lot of inaccuracies" in the reports and reiterated that she had released 55,000 pages of emails and would answer questions from congressional investigators.

On the economy, she said part of her agenda is meant to help young workers who have struggled in the aftermath of the 2008 financial crisis. Corporate America would need to take the lead in focusing on long-term growth, she said, but she aimed to help with that realignment.

"American business needs to break free from the tyranny of today's earnings report so they can do what they do best: innovate, invest and build tomorrow's prosperity," she said.

The centerpiece would be her plan to raise capital gains taxes for wealthy investors — couples earning more than $465,000 a year — through the creation of a six-year sliding scale. Under her plan, the capital gains rate for the top income bracket would be 39.6 percent if the shares were sold within a year, matching the top rate for ordinary income levels. After two years, the rates would decline, reaching 20 percent after six years.

Republicans and conservative-aligned groups panned the approach, saying it would create new complications for business and wouldn't help the economy.

Americans for Tax Reform, a group founded by conservative activist Grover Norquist, said in a statement the plan would "only serve to distort capital markets" as investors buy and sell based on taxation considerations instead of "rational market signals."

Clinton would also offer tax incentives for small businesses, offering zero capital gains taxes on certain small business stock held for more than five years. And she would offer to eliminate capital gains taxes for certain long-term investments in hard-hit areas like inner cities, the Rust Belt, coal country and Indian country.

On executive compensation, Clinton said the tax code created incentives for CEOs and others to sacrifice long-term value in exchange for short-term boosts to the company's stock price. She urged a reexamination of that approach.

"There is something wrong when senior executives get rich while companies stutter and employees struggle," she said.

Clinton said she would seek a review of shareholder activism, arguing that some "hit and run" activists can have an unhealthy influence on corporate decision-making. And she outlined plans to seek a review of stock buybacks, which she said are often used by companies to boost share prices at the expense of long-term investment like research and development.

In new White House bid, Clinton embraces race as a top issue // AP // Bill Barrow - July 24, 2015

In her second bid for the presidency, Hillary Rodham Clinton is discussing "systemic racism" and making the issue a hallmark of her campaign as she looks to connect with the black voters who supported rival Barack Obama in 2008.

At multiple stops in South Carolina, Clinton on Thursday bemoaned "mass incarceration," an uneven economy, increasingly segregated public schools and poisoned relations between law enforcement and the black community. She praised South Carolina leaders, including Republican Gov. Nikki Haley, for removing the Confederate battle flag from statehouse grounds after a white gunman's massacre of nine people at a historic black church in Charleston, but she warned that the act is only symbolic.

"America's long struggle with racism is far from finished," the former secretary of state said before a mostly white audience at a Greenville technical college. Hours earlier, with a majority black audience at a West Columbia church, she declared, "Anybody who says we don't have more progress to make is blind."

At both stops, she added some symbolism of her own, trumpeting the mantra "Black Lives Matter," which has become a rallying cry of and name for the activists who have organized protests in several cities amid several high-profile cases of black citizens being killed during encounters with police.

"This is not just a slogan," Clinton said. "This should be a guiding principle."

The bold approach is a contrast to her 2008 campaign. That year, she didn't talk so directly about race as she faced off against Obama, who would go on to become the nation's first black president. Instead, she ran as the battle-tested, experienced counter to the first-term U.S. senator from Illinois.

Clinton doesn't frame her unabashed commentary on race in a political context; aides repeatedly explain her strategy as "working to win every vote" and nothing more. Yet it's clear that Clinton feels no constraints going into 2016, as perhaps she did eight years ago. It's also no surprise that her newfound freedom is on display in South Carolina. African-Americans make up about 28 percent of the population and a majority of the Democratic primary electorate, the first of the early-voting states to feature a significant bloc of black voters.

Obama trounced Clinton here in 2008, 56 percent to 27 percent, as many black voters flocked to his candidacy once he demonstrated white support in the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary. That leaves Clinton both to reverse a bitter primary defeat, while using South Carolina as a test run for a potential general election in which she would need strong black support to reassemble Obama's winning coalition in swing states like Virginia, Florida and Ohio.

If Clinton's approach is born of necessity, it also comes with potential pitfalls.

Last month, she angered some activists by using the phrase "all lives matter" during a speech a few miles from Ferguson, Missouri, where Michael Brown died at the hands of a white police officer. Clinton used those words as part of an anecdote about her mother, whom she said taught her that "all lives matter," but some activists thought it demeaned the significance of the "Black Lives Matter" effort.

Her Democratic rivals Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders drew similar outrage last week at the liberal Netroots Nation convention. O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, ended up apologizing after snapping at hecklers: "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter."

Clinton said Thursday that she won't "comment on what anybody else said."

She also faces questions about her advocacy for tougher sentencing laws that her husband signed as president. Bill Clinton recently expressed regret over the laws, but his wife stopped short of calling the laws a mistake.

"We were facing different problems in the '80s and '90s," she told reporters, saying crime in cities "was causing an outcry across the nation," including in poor and minority neighborhoods. "I think now, 20 years on, we can say some things worked and some things didn't work," she continued. "One of the big problems that didn't work is that we had too many people, particularly African-American men, who were being incarcerated for minor offenses."

Clinton also must avoid any residue from Bill Clinton's remarks during and after the South Carolina primary in 2008. Clinton, who was extremely popular among black voters when he was president, expressed open frustration at Obama's rise. After Obama won South Carolina, the former president dismissed the victory as akin to Rev. Jesse Jackson's victory in 1988. A black South Carolina native, Jackson won the state's caucus that year, but he was never a serious contender for the nomination.

Meanwhile, Clinton says she will continue declaring that "black lives matter."

"I think this has become an important statement of a movement," she said, "to try to raise difficult issues about race and justice that the country needs to address."

Hillary Clinton's plan for corporate America // Politico // Annie Karni - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In her first big address detailing her approach to reforming Wall Street and corporate America, Hillary Clinton laid out a plan that would increase taxes on short-term investors. She also voiced support for more transparency when it comes to executive compensation and stock buyback transactions, and said she supports raising the minimum wage to $15-an-hour — at least in expensive cities like New York and Los Angeles.

Clinton's campaign has presented her proposals as more realistic than the progressive ideals touted by her Democratic opponents in the presidential race — with the benefit of even being palatable to many top corporate executives. But her speech still managed to find critics on both sides.

Clinton said she would reform capital gains taxes by moving to a six-year sliding scale to incentivize top earners to hold onto their stocks for longer. "The current definition of a long term holding period, just one year, is woefully inadequate," Clinton said during a 30-minute speech at New York University's Stern School of Business. "That may count as long-term for my baby granddaughter, but not for the American economy."

For taxpayers in the top income bracket — families earning more than $465,000 a year — any gains from selling stock in the first two years would be taxed at the higher ordinary income rate, Clinton said. The rate would decrease from there. Clinton did not provide specific numbers for the taxes in her speech. Those numbers were detailed only on her website: investments held between one and two years would be taxed just like regular income — at 39.6 percent, up from the current 20 percent capital gains tax rate. That rate would fall by four points every year after that, until it reached the current 20 percent rate after six years.

"The truth is her plan just makes more losers by crushing investors with higher taxes," said David McIntosh, president of the conservative Club for Growth activist group. "The fact is Hillary wants to punish success in order to grow government, and that means the biggest loser will be our economy. We need a capital gains rate that is consistent across the board — consistently zero."

On the left, some thought she did not go far enough. "We look forward to the Clinton campaign's big speech on systemic reforms," said Adam Green, co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee. "The American public will look to see if she is willing to challenge Wall Street power."

Her goal, Clinton said, was to foster long-term economic growth and ultimately raise incomes of the middle class. Clinton said real value comes from companies making long-term investments, including in their workforce. "You may have heard that I am a fan of Chipotle, and it's not just because of their burrito bowl," Clinton said, lauding the company for a new policy that provides paid sick days, paid vacation time and tuition reimbursements to its part-time employees.

As president, Clinton said she would look for ways to eliminate capital gains taxes all together for "certain long term investments in small businesses including innovative start-ups, and hard hit communities, from inner cities, to the rust belt, to coal country."

Clinton also called for more transparency in stock buyback transactions through more frequent reporting, and more information about executive compensation.

"Thirty years ago, top CEOs made 50 times what a typical worker did," she said. "Today they make 300 times more. That just doesn't make sense." She said there is no excuse for a five-year delay in implementing a statute of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street reform act that requires companies to publish the ratio between CEO pay and the pay of regular employees. "Workers have a right to know whether executive pay has gotten out of balance and so does the public," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She also expressed support for a $15-an-hour minimum wage proposal for fast food workers in New York, recommended earlier this week by a state panel. But she stopped short of endorsing a national $15 minimum wage, which her Democratic opponents Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley support.

"The national minimum wage is a floor and it needs to be raised," she said. But she warned, "the cost of living in Manhattan is different Little Rock and many other places." On the campaign trail in South Carolina Thursday, Clinton said a $10.10 national minimum wage would be a "good starting place."

Clinton's speech had been previewed by her top aides in the days leading up to her address as an important piece of her economic policy to ensure long-term growth. But on Friday, it was overshadowed by news that the Justice Department had been asked by two inspectors general to open a criminal investigation into whether classified information had potentially been sent from Clinton's personal email account during her tenure at the State Department. She briefly addressed the controversy before launching into her speech and vowing not to be distracted.

"I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House Committee," she said. "We are all accountable to get the facts right. I will do my part. but I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

GOP says Clinton must turn over server after news of probe // Politico // Rachael Bade - July 24, 2015

Revelations that Hillary Clinton received classified emails on her unsecured personal server set off partisan warfare on Friday as both parties argued over whether it could lead to a criminal investigation of the 2016 presidential front-runner.

Republicans and Democrats sharply differed in their interpretations of news that at least one inspector general asked the Justice Department to probe the matter, and whether it would implicate the former Secretary of State.

House Republicans say it seems suspicious, with House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) demanding that Clinton turn over her server.

"Two inspectors generals appointed by President Obama have now called on the Justice Department to investigate Secretary Clinton's mishandling of classified email," the Ohio Republican said. "If Secretary Clinton truly has nothing to hide, she can prove it by immediately turning over her server to the proper authorities and allowing them to examine the complete record."

But Democrats say a letter to Congress from one of the inspectors general includes details that absolve Clinton: According to the letter from the intelligence committee IG, the classified emails found by the watchdog were not marked as such, suggesting Clinton did not knowingly break the law, Democrats argue.

Knowing that something is classified, experts say, makes all the difference when accusing someone of leaking classified intel.

The New York Times first reported the news in a blockbuster story Thursday, writing that Obama Administration inspectors generals for the State Department and intelligence community asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal probe into "whether Hillary Rodham Clinton mishandled sensitive government information on a private email account she used as secretary of state."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the authors later revised the story — which had suggested Clinton was personally under investigation — following pushback from Clinton's campaign. The inspectors general were instead looking generally "into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with" Clinton's emails.

And Democrats are now arguing that, technically, only one inspector general made a "referral": the intelligence watchdog.

The left jumped on the story, calling it inaccurate and irresponsible, with Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) saying Friday he "spoke personally with the State Department Inspector General and the Intelligence Community Inspector General together, and they both confirmed directly to me that they never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage." According to Cummings, they said the referral was a "routine' referral," and "they have no idea how the New York Times got this so wrong."

"This is the latest example in a series of inaccurate leaks to generate false front-page headlines — only to be corrected later — and they have absolutely nothing to do with the attacks in Benghazi or protecting our diplomatic corps overseas," he said.

Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.), the Ranking Member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, in a statement called the whole mix-up "deeply irresponsible."

Democrats also pushed heavily back on the notion that anything was marked classified, pointing to an intelligence community inspector general letter to Congress that said they were not.

But "marked" turned out to be the key word — because they were indeed classified, even if they weren't identified as such.

The intelligence community watchdog found at least four emails, out of a small sample of 40, where "secret" classified information was shared between Clinton and the other parities, according to the letter sent to the Hill.

It's unclear why the emails were not encrypted with classification identifiers. Though one explanation could be that Clinton and her correspondents were simply talking about a classified topic, not passing an official documents.

It's also unclear whether Clinton or individuals on the chain knew the information was classified.

"We note that none of the emails we reviewed has classification or dissemination markings, but some included IC-derived classified information and should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked, and transmitted via a secure network," the letter reads.

Clinton, of course, used her own personal email account rather than an official State address as is required under government record-keeping rules. And she'd previously said she did not send or receive classified information on the server.

At the very least, the letter significantly undermines the claim that Clinton did not send classified emails, but whether criminal charges may follow is a different question.

Criminal probe or not, Republicans pounced and are likely to ask for an inspector general to review the matter independent of the Obama Administration-controlled Justice Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They also want her server — or, to have her hand it over to the inspector general.

"Hillary Clinton's desire to play by her own rules may have further exposed classified information," said RNC Chairman Reince Priebus in a statement. "While a full investigation by the Justice Department is not just needed, but required, Hillary Clinton must also hand her entire secret server over to an independent third party for further review."

Despite the disagreement about the severity of the inquiry, the news offered some vindication for the House Select Committee on Benghazi Republicans, who for months have been trying to ward of accusations that they're on a witch-hunt aimed at making the 2016 democratic front-runner look bad.

Benghazi panel Chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) in a statement said he "appreciates" that the IGs have "confirmed this is a serious and nonpartisan national security matter by any objective measure."

Gowdy, who has also called on Clinton to turn over her server, welcomed a Justice probe.

"This certainly merits further review by the Executive Branch to determine the legal and national security implications posed by the former Secretary's unusual email arrangement in order to mitigate any potential counterintelligence risks and minimize the damage caused by this scheme," he said. "These issues should be evaluated under the same strict standards that would apply to anyone found to be in possession of classified information outside of an approved system."

Hillary Clinton on email scandal: Everybody calm down // Politico // Josh Gerstein and Hanna Trudo - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Friday sought to downplay the latest twist in the long-running scandal over her use of a private email server while she was secretary of state, saying reports of a possible criminal probe are full of inaccuracies.

News emerged on Thursday evening that at least one inspector general passed to the Justice Department evidence of potential mishandling of classified information, a referral that could lead to a criminal investigation.

Clinton on Friday said people are getting worked up over not much. "Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," she said, in remarks before a policy speech in New York on Wall Street.

She went on to express frustration over what she called erroneous reporting. "We all have a responsibility to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails. I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House committee. We are all accountable to get the facts right. I will do my part. But I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

Clinton appeared to be loose with her phrasing, however. She has not personally released any emails to the public — only to the State Department, which is reviewing them for release in monthly batches.

The controversy has dogged Clinton for five months, at times overshadowing her on the campaign trail, and presenting one of the biggest outstanding risks to her bid for the presidency. The revelation that she used a private account, which represented a break from State Department protocol, has reinforced the reputation that the Clintons are secretive and operate by a different set of rules.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The scandal could get more serious if a criminal probe is initiated, but it's not clear when or if that will happen, and there have been evolving reports in the past 24 hours.

The New York Times first reported the referral, and ended up making subtle, but significant alterations to its story late Thursday night, apparently in response to criticism from the Clinton campaign. The paper later attached a correction to the online story, saying a prior version misstated the nature of the referral to the Justice Department due to misinformation from senior government officials.

Clinton spokesperson Nick Merrill said about the New York Times story, "Contrary to the initial story, which has already been significantly revised, she followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials. As has been reported on multiple occasions, any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted."

Clinton spokesman Brian Fallon said the campaign is pleased about the New York Times' correction but said the situation should have never happened.

"I think they got taken for a ride here by partisan sources," Fallon said on MSNBC's "Now with Alex Wagner" Friday.

He also criticized House Speaker John Boehner renewed demand that Clinton turn over her server immediately. He cited two inspectors general calling on the Justice Department to probe Clinton's mishandling of classified email.

"These statements that you've seen today from Speaker Boehner have deliberately mischaracterized" the situation, Fallon said.

In an attempt to clarify reports, a Justice Department official said on Friday, "The Department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information. It is not a criminal referral."

A spokeswoman for I. Charles McCullough III, the intelligence community's inspector general, confirmed that MCullough had contacted the FBI about a "potential compromise of classified information" regarding Clinton's email.

"It was a counterintelligence referral to the proper office at the FBI. It's up to them how to proceed," said the spokeswoman, Andrea Williams. "We also referred it to the appropriate security officials within the Intelligence Community. Our office is statutorily required to refer compromises of national security information. IG's don't work compromise cases."

In a letter sent to Congress late Thursday, McCullough said the State Department's recent releases of some of Clinton's emails — disclosures prompted by Freedom of Information Act requests and a court order for monthly posting of the emails online — had already led to "an inadvertent release of classified national security information." The State Department disputes that the information was classified, McCullough said.

McCullough also said he was concerned that Clinton's private attorney, David Kendall, reportedly continues to have copies on a thumb drive of the roughly 30,000 emails the former secretary returned to State in December at the agency's request.

Clinton campaign spokesmen had no immediate comment on the claim about the thumb drive. The campaign has rebuffed prior questions about what was done with the contents of about 26 emails State has deemed classified in the past two months.

The overall impact of the scandal so far is hard to determine, but polling numbers show worrying signs. A Quinnipiac University Swing State Poll found last month that a majority of voters in three key swing states view Hillary Clinton as not honest and trustworthy.

Much of the dispute has revolved around the question of whether Clinton inappropriately was using her personal server to communicate about classified information.

Clinton has denied anything inappropriate.

“I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email,” she said in March. “There is no classified material. So I’m certainly well aware of the classification requirements and did not send classified material.”

But some of the emails have been deemed classified at later dates, muddling the issue.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, the lead Democrat on the House Select Committee on Benghazi, which is probing Clinton’s email use, rose to her defense on Friday.

“The Benghazi Select Committee has obtained zero evidence that any emails to or from Secretary Clinton were marked as classified at the time they were transmitted, although some have been retroactively classified since then,” Cummings said. “This is the latest example in a series of inaccurate leaks to generate false front-page headlines — only to be corrected later — and they have absolutely nothing to do with the attacks in Benghazi or protecting our diplomatic corps overseas.”

Meanwhile, Republicans pounced on the latest revelation.

“Now we learn that Hillary Clinton’s desire to play by her own rules may have further exposed classified information,” Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus said in a statement. “While a full investigation by the Justice Department is not just needed, but required, Hillary Clinton must also hand her entire secret server over to an independent third party for further review.”

The State Department is looking over more than 55,000 pages of correspondence provided by Clinton after her private email practices were made public. So far, 3,000 pages have been released, including some emails with redactions.

State Department spokesman Alec Gerlach said in a statement: “We are working with both the State IG and the Intelligence Community’s inspector general to ensure that our review of former Secretary Clinton’s emails is completed in a manner that protects sensitive and potentially classified information.”

The dispute over Clinton’s emails is playing out in multiple arenas, including federal court. Last week, State Department lawyers came under questioning by a federal judge regarding multiple pending Freedom of Information Act request from The Associated Press.

POLITICO obtained a transcript of remarks by U.S. District Court Judge Richard J. Leon, who initiated the questioning.

“I want to find out what’s been going on over there — I should say, what’s not been going on over there,” he said, adding that the State Department “has been, to say the least, recalcitrant in responding.”

Hillary Clinton Faults ‘Hit-and-Run’ Activist Investors // Bloomberg // Brandon Kochkodin and Caleb Melby - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton sharpened her criticism against what she sees as Wall Street excess by targeting investors who demand short-term corporate measures like share buybacks and dividends to pump up a company’s stock price.

“We need a new generation of committed, long-term investors to provide a counter-weight to the hit-and-run activists,” the Democratic presidential candidate said Friday in a speech at New York University’s Stern School of Business. She contrasted her favored approach with investors who agitate for immediate change “no matter how much it discourages and distracts management from pursuing strategies that would add the most long-term value.”

Clinton has made economic inequality a centerpiece of her campaign, and has previously said that the nation’s top 25 hedge fund managers earn more than all of U.S. kindergarten teachers combined. Still, she’s received donations from big-name fund managers such as Paul Tudor Jones, the billionaire founder of Tudor Investment Corp., and Jamie Dinan, who started York Capital.

The former secretary of state and U.S. senator didn’t single out any fund managers for criticism by name, nor did she cite specific confrontations that hurt companies’ prospects. She did say that businesses and the economy would have more sustainable growth if the focus turned to reinvesting capital.

“Real value comes from long-term growth, not short-term profits,” said Clinton, 67. “It comes from building companies, not stripping them; from creating good jobs, not eliminating them; from seeing workers as assets to cultivate, not costs to be cut.”

‘Quarterly Capitalism’

Third Point’s Dan Loeb and Paul Singer, who runs Elliott Management, are among money managers who pursue activist tactics and have donated to Republicans seeking that party’s presidential nomination. Loeb supported former Florida Governor Jeb Bush. Singer has hosted events for Bush, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Governors John Kasich of Ohio, Scott Walker of Wisconsin and New Jersey’s Chris Christie.

Clinton is proposing that the top 43.4 percent tax rate on short-term capital gains be extended to apply to assets held for less than two years, compared with the current one-year threshold. Beyond that, she would implement a sliding scale of long-term capital gains rates, and taxpayers in the top bracket would have to keep holdings for at least six years to get today’s rate of 23.8 percent, which would remain the lowest available.

She also faulted executive pay packages containing options and restricted shares, which she said contribute to “quarterly capitalism.”

Many stock-heavy pay packages “have created a perverse incentive for executives to seek the big payouts that could come from a temporary rise in share prices,” she said.

Hillary Clinton's Fix for Short-Termism? They Tried It in 1934 // Bloomberg // Peter Coy - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton didn't mention 1934 in her speech today about fighting short-termism, but she could have. The last time the U.S. taxed capital gains roughly the way she wants to was from 1934 to 1941, from the depths of the Great Depression to the eve of World War II.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In other words, when it comes to tax policy, everything old is new again. In a speech at New York University's Stern School of Business, the Democratic presidential candidate said that giving preferential tax treatment to investments that are held longer would give investors an incentive to be more patient so companies could embark on projects with big upfront costs and long-term payoffs. "We need a new generation of committed, long-term investors to provide a counterweight to the hit-and-run activists," Clinton said.

Will it work? It's hard to say. Economists have found little to no linkage between capital gains tax rates and growth rates of the U.S. economy over the years, says Len Burman, an expert on the topic who is director of the centrist Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center in Washington. "I'm sympathetic with the goal of encouraging long-term investment," Burman said, but added, "I don't think it's really going to do what she thinks it's going to do. ... I don't think this is a particularly well-designed instrument."

Capital gains taxes have fluctuated drastically along with changes in who runs Washington and also changing advice from the economics professoriate. From the start of the income tax in 1913 until 1921, capital gains were taxed the same as ordinary income, such as wages. Taxes on investments held for a longer period have been taxed lower most of the time since, with one year being the most common cutoff for short- vs. long-term. But from 1934 to 1941, taxation was graduated a bit like the way Clinton is proposing. Instead of having a lower rate on longer-held investments, the Internal Revenue Service excluded part of capital gains from taxation.

"For example, in 1934 and 1935, 20, 40, 60, and 70 percent of gains were excluded on assets held 1, 2, 5, and 10 years, respectively," according to an article by a Treasury Dept. staffer that was published in an encyclopedia. That changed in 1942, as the U.S. ramped up involvement in World War II and the tax system changed abruptly. There don't seem to have been any authoritative studies showing positive or negative effects of the Depression-era system—a difficult task considering everything else that was going on at the time.

Changing the tax code to combat short-term thinking is hardly a lefty fringe idea. Among the people who has been warning against short-termism in recent speeches is Laurence Fink, CEO of BlackRock, the world's biggest money manager, with more than $4 trillion in assets. "Even our tax code seems designed to encourage short-term strategies," Fink wrote in April in an essay on the website of McKinsey & Co., the blue-chip management consulting firm. "Paying significantly lower taxes for capital gains, a major component of tax policy, is predicated on one-year holding periods," Fink wrote. "Who really believes a one-year commitment is long term?"

McKinsey has also been warning that short-term thinking is harmful to long-term growth. "I don't think this alone will solve it but we've got to jolt the system out of its short-term mindset," Dominic Barton, the global managing director, said in an interview.

Capital gains are profits earned by selling investments for more than you bought them for. Clinton is proposing that the top 43.4 percent tax rate on short-term capital gains be extended to apply to assets held for less than two years, vs. the current one-year threshold. For two years and beyond, the tax rate would decline until reaching today's long-term rate of 23.8 percent for assets held six years or more. Those rates would apply to people in the highest tax bracket, those earning over $400,000 a year.

The trade group for private-equity investors is interested in what Clinton has to say. Private-equity investors usually invest for five to seven years, which would qualify them for low capital gains taxes under the proposal. "It seems like she wants to encourage investing for the long term, which is directly in line with the private equity model," says James Maloney, spokesman for the Private Equity Growth Capital Council.

But Clinton's plan also got some pushback. Alan Viard, an economist at the American Enterprise Institute, said it would "increase the tax system's bias against investment" by raising capital gains-taxes on investments held between one year and six years. He said it also worsens the lock-in effect—that is, it gives people a tax incentive to hold onto investments they would rather get rid of. That could involve keeping money in an old, tired company rather than investing in a promising start-up. Viard said that executive compensation might be a better avenue for addressing short-termism. (Clinton also said she wanted to do something about executive pay, including changing tax deductions on performance based pay, such as stock options.)

Burman, the tax scholar at the Tax Policy Center, said Clinton's implicit argument is that some activist investors force companies to abandon promising projects and return cash to shareholders, which the shareholders end up deploying in less worthwhile ways, Burman said. That may be true sometimes, he said, but if the activists did that routinely they would end up losing money. "Probably a lot of companies have cash on hand they don't have good prospects for. Activists are getting them to disgorge it. Unless they're systematically making misjudgments that's what you want them to do."

Clinton's proposal was surprisingly specific—surprising because the detail gives her opponents something to shoot at. "I like when people are putting stuff out in the open," said Robert Wolf, founder and CEO of 32Advisors, a New York-based advisory firm, and a supporter of Democratic candidates. "It allows us to have a real debate. I'd rather have this debate on tax reform and how to get middle income wages moving again than the debate the Republicans are having , which is just kind of hard to follow."

Hillary Clinton wants to raise capital gains taxes to encourage long-term investment, making it more expensive to sell stocks held for less than six years and adding complexity to the U.S. tax system.

Compared with today’s two-tier system -- a 43.4 percent top rate for assets held less than a year and 23.8 percent beyond that -- the proposal by Clinton, a Democratic presidential candidate, would create a six-rate structure for capital gains for high-income households.

For Americans in the top tax bracket, assets held for less than two years would be taxed at the top ordinary-income tax rate of 43.4 percent, according to the campaign.

The rate would drop to 39.8 percent after two years, 35.8 percent after three years, 31.8 percent after four years and 27.8 percent after five years. Taxpayers would have to hold onto assets for at least six years to get the 23.8 percent rate, which would remain the lowest available.

Clinton wants to push capital gains taxes higher than the 28 percent proposed earlier this year by President Barack Obama -- and higher than the 20 percent maximum Clinton advocated in her 2008 campaign for president. The former U.S. senator and secretary of state attributes her shift to an urgent need to address short-term thinking by investors and corporations.

Clinton’s proposal would raise taxes for the nation’s wealthiest households while encouraging buy-and-hold investing. Her plan would apply only in the top tax bracket -- currently taxable income exceeding $413,200 for individuals and $464,850 for married couples.

Top 1 Percent

Those levels are where capital gains are concentrated. The top 1 percent of U.S. households -- those with incomes exceeding $641,000 -- receive 75 percent of the benefits of today’s preferential rates for long-term capital gains and dividends, according to the Tax Policy Center. Almost half of the benefits go to the top 0.1 percent, those with incomes exceeding $3.3 million.

Clinton's plan would have significant costs, tying up capital in investments that taxpayers would exit but for the tax cost.

And it's far from clear how well it would combat what Clinton and her allies see as a plague of short-term thinking in corporate America. Clinton is giving a speech Friday criticizing capitalism that's overly focused on the next earnings report, and she'll say that capital-gains tax changes alone won't alter that mindset.

"It's just very hard to make a connection between capital gains tax rates through the cost of capital to investment and then growth," said Joel Slemrod, a University of Michigan tax economist. "I see the point. It's a plausible point, but I just don't have any evidence to look at to judge whether this is going to have a big effect or small effect."

Third Proposal

The capital gains plan is Clinton's third major tax proposal of the campaign, along with tax credits for apprenticeships and profit sharing with employees.

In all of the plans, she's aiming to reshape corporate incentives beyond the near term to encourage sustained investment.

Clinton's proposal draws on work from the Democratic-aligned Center for American Progress and the Aspen Institute. Aspen proposed sliding-scale capital gains tax rates as part of an agenda against short-term thinking in a 2009 paper endorsed by billionaire Warren Buffett and John Bogle, founder of the Vanguard Group.

'Naturally Short-Term'

"What you're talking about is a natural human nature problem, the way our brains are wired to be naturally short-term," said Miguel Padro, senior program manager at the Aspen Institute. "The tax code is a potential tool to help combat that."

Two of Clinton's Democratic presidential rivals -- Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders -- have gone further in trying to end super-short-term thinking. They've endorsed a tax on financial transactions, which would reduce high-frequency trading.

The top capital gains rate has fluctuated over time, with a preference often included to encourage investing, limit double taxation of corporate income and counter the effects of inflation in a tax system that uses nominal dollars. The 1986 revamp of the tax code signed by Ronald Reagan set it at 28 percent, applying the same rate as ordinary income.

The rates diverged in the 1990s under Bill Clinton, with the capital gains rate hitting 20 percent, about half of the top rate on wages. President George W. Bush drove the capital gains rate to 15 percent before Obama and the Democratic Congress raised it to 23.8 percent.

Tax-Rate Sensitivity

Some investors -- particularly those who can wait to time their asset sales for tax purposes -- are highly sensitive to tax rates.

In 2012, U.S. taxpayers claimed 60.4 percent more in capital gains than they did in 2011, locking in lower rates before the 2013 tax increase took effect.

After an initial boost, higher tax rates discourage selling. This would be especially so in Clinton's proposed system, which dangles a lower rate for those who hold on longer.

"You're locked into BlackBerry, when all of a sudden there's Apple," said Mark Bloomfield, president of the American Council on Capital Formation, a Washington group that advocates lower investment taxes. "That's sort of the biggest problem with it."

The proposal stands little chance of success if Republicans continue to control Congress. That party's candidates are racing to reduce capital gains taxes -- and Senator Marco Rubio wants to eliminate them entirely.

Alvin Rabushka, co-author of flat-tax proposals that don't tax capital gains, said Clinton is taking the wrong approach.

"She couldn't be more wrong if she tried in raising capital gains rates," he said this week at a Heritage Foundation event. In Silicon Valley, where he's a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, Rabushka said, "we're not interested in long-term preferences."

Hillary Clinton Calls for Investors to Escape 'Tyranny' of 'Short Termism' // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton will on Friday unveil a set of proposals aimed at encouraging companies and investors to favor long-term growth over the "tyranny of today's earnings report."

In the second economic policy speech of her campaign, to be delivered Friday afternoon at New York University's Stern School of Business, Clinton plans to offer up proposals aimed squarely at the nation's investor class. They range from overhauling capital gains rates and the taxation of executive compensation, to better policing of shareholder activism and stock buybacks.

The proposals appear calibrated to hit a sweet spot that will satisfy progressive Democrats while not angering Clinton's Wall Street donors.

The speech elaborates the bigger-picture economic address Clinton gave on July 13, in which she lamented that "today's marketplace focuses too much on the short term, like second to second financial trading, and quarterly earnings reports, and too little on long-term investments."

On Friday, a campaign official said, Clinton will argue that "short termism" is harming the economy and suggest that companies be incentivized by the federal government to make longer term investments in plants, equipment and people.

According to the campaign official, the ideas Clinton will present include:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. Overhauling capital gains taxes

For the top income tax bracket, capital gains taxes would be determined using a sliding scale, in which shorter-duration trades and gains would be taxed at a higher rate than longer term ones. Unlike the current tax code, which provides a preferential rate for all investments held more than a year, Clinton wants to make tax benefits greater the longer the investment is held. Clinton will acknowledge that changes to the tax code won't immediately change investors' behavior but believes it's a first step in realigning incentives.

The sliding-scale capital gains tax is an idea about which some Clinton allies have been publicly supportive. Last month, Neera Tanden, the president Center for American Progress and a longtime Clinton policy adviser, and Blair Effron, a co-founder of Centerview Partners who hosted a Clinton fundraiser in May, published a policy paper backing this approach.

2. Changing taxation on executive compensation

Clinton believes the tax code can be used to better align executives' financial interests with boosting long-term value. The former New York senator will say that the current tax code can create circumstances in which executives choose short-term bumps in share prices over long-term value and recommend re-examining the tax code to change those incentives.

3. Reining in activist shareholders

When shareholder watchdogs hold corporate management accountable, their activism can be a good thing, Clinton will say. But it can also go too far, and the "hit-and-run" approach of some can be detrimental to a company's long-term interest.

4. Disclosing of stock buybacks

Clinton will note that such buybacks are often used to boost short-term share prices at the expense of long-term investment, and will call for more transparency. Clinton will note that the United States only requires that companies disclose buybacks on a quarterly basis, while buybacks in the United Kingdom and Hong Kong must be disclosed with a day.

Clinton emails contained classified material: U.S. inspector // Reuters // Jonathan Allen - July 24, 2015

At least four emails from the private email account that former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton used while in office contained classified information, according to a government inspector's letter that deepened the email controversy dogging Clinton's 2016 presidential campaign.

The inspector general of the intelligence community wrote in a letter to members of Congress on Thursday that a sampling of 40 of 30,000 Clinton emails found at least four that should have been classified as secret.

The information in the emails was derived from the U.S. intelligence community "and should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked and transmitted via a secure network," the inspector general, Charles McCullough, wrote. His letter was made available on Friday on a House of Representatives website.

Clinton's use of her private email account for her work as America's top diplomat came to light in March and drew fire from political opponents who accused her of sidestepping transparency and record-keeping laws.

The former first lady has said she sent no classified information on her private email account. The inspector general's comments left open the possibility that Clinton sent or received emails with classified material that she was not aware of.

The front-runner to represent the Democratic Party in the November 2016 election, Clinton has repeatedly said she broke no laws or rules by eschewing a standard government email account.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said in a statement she "followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials."

Clinton handed over some 30,000 emails from the private account to the State Department after she quit in 2013, but many thousands of others that she says are not related to her work were deleted.

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part," Clinton said at a speech in New York, noting she had handed over tens of thousands of pages of emails.

McCullough said State Department officials had told his office "that there are potentially hundreds of classified emails within the approximately 30,000 provided by former Secretary Clinton."

Republicans in Congress and on the presidential campaign trail have seized on the email scandal to portray Clinton as continuing secretive practices they say they also characterized President Bill Clinton's eight years in office.

While Clinton faces little competition for the Democratic Party's nomination, several recent polls have found a majority of voters find her untrustworthy, a perception exacerbated by controversy over her emails. The U.S. Justice Department said on Friday it is weighing a request by two government inspectors to look into the possible mishandling of classified information from Clinton's private email account.

The department said earlier in the day it had been asked to treat the issue as a potential criminal matter, but later backtracked to drop a reference to any criminal investigation.

Clinton proposes tax, buyback changes to encourage long-term growth // Reuters // Jonathan Allen and Luciana Lopez - July 24, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton proposed U.S. corporate tax reforms on Friday including a sliding scale for capital gains taxes, greater transparency for stock buybacks and changes in executive compensation to encourage long-term economic growth.

Clinton, in a speech in New York, said institutional investors have an obligation to counter "hit and run" activist shareholders. She also said the U.S. government needs to "stop pouring subsidies into industries that are already thriving," such as the oil industry.

Clinton, front-runner in the race for the Democratic Party's nomination, is working to draw in progressive voters in her party while not alienating big-money donors from Wall Street as she seeks to build a broad coalition going into the general election in November 2016.

But Clinton was criticized by Republicans, who generally prefer less regulation of capital markets.

A spokesman for Republican candidate and U.S. Senator Marco Rubio said in a statement that Clinton's tax policy was outdated.

"Hillary Clinton’s tax proposal picks winners and losers," said the spokesman, Alex Conant, "and ultimately leaves behind the working class."

Clinton called for government and private companies to join in the fight against "quarterly capitalism."

"It's bad for business, it’s bad for wages and it’s bad for our economy," she said of short-term thinking at the expense of long-term growth.

Clinton argued that the tax code and U.S. laws currently allow or even encourage companies to focus on short-term gains in stock prices in a way that undercuts the economy's long-term growth and harms middle-class incomes.

The former U.S. senator and secretary of state also said "there is something wrong when senior executives get rich" while companies and workers suffer.

"How do we define shareholder value in the 21st century?" Clinton asked. "Is it maximizing immediate returns or delivering long-term growth?"

Companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 stock market index spent $566 billion buying back their shares in 2014, up from $480 billion in 2013 and the highest amount since 2007, according to research firm FactSet.

She pointed to other countries that require companies to disclose buybacks daily, giving regulators and outside investors more information about the transactions and causes of share price changes. "Here in the U.S. you can go an entire quarter without disclosing," she said. "Let's change that."

Clinton's main rival for the Democratic Party nomination, Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, has drawn crowds of thousands by appealing to progressives, despite being far less well-known than Clinton.

He has, for example, endorsed their call for increasing the federal minimum wage to $15. Clinton suggested on Friday that while this might make sense in New York City, where the cost of living is high, it made less sense in cheaper parts of the country.

Executive pay, padded out with stocks and options, has become increasingly structured with "perverse incentives" to inflate payouts by focusing on short-term rises in share prices, she said. Companies should accept legal provisions yet to be fully enacted that require them to say, in a ratio, how much more executives are paid than other employees, a disparity that has widened in recent decades.

She was also critical of generous executive pay packages during her last attempt to win the presidency in 2008, when she also ran on a platform seen to be to the left of the more centrist economic policies of her husband, Bill

Clinton, when he was president.

Her speech on Friday added to downward pressure on U.S. stocks, which were falling in afternoon trading.

Justice Department: No criminal referral over Clinton emails // Reuters // Susan Heavey - July 24, 2015

The Justice Department said Friday it has received a request to examine the handling of classified information related to the private emails from Hillary Clinton during her time as secretary of state, but it is not a criminal referral.

The department's statement followed a report by the New York Times that Justice Department officials had received a request to open a criminal investigation into the Clinton emails.

A separate memo disclosed Friday from government inspector generals expressed concern about how the emails were being handled as they were prepared for release to the public.

Hillary's emails touched off debate about classified documents // Politico // Josh Gerstein - July 24, 2015

At least four emails Hillary Clinton kept on a private server during her years as Secretary of State were classified "secret" at the time, according to an inspector general review — a finding that calls into question her assertion in March that she took care to avoid sending classified materials.

However, suggestions from Clinton aides that she didn't knowingly keep classified information on the private account still have some life. So far, it appears none of the information was marked as classified before it moved into or out of her home-cooked email system, but that caveat has not stemmed Republican complaints that it was reckless for her to handle her sensitive work on a private system.

"None of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings, but some included [Intelligence Community]-derived classified information and should have been handled and transmitted via a secure network," Intelligence Community Inspector General I. Charles McCullough III said in a letter to congressional committee leaders Thursday.

McCullough said a limited sample of just 40 emails "revealed four contained classified IC information that should have been marked and handled at the SECRET level" — the middle of three broad tiers of classification. The claim became public as McCullough disclosed to Congress that he had advised the FBI of a potential "compromise" of classified information in the Clinton email episode —a referral that could lead to a criminal investigation.

It's a violation of federal law for a government official to "knowingly" move "materials containing classified information" to "an unauthorized location."

Soon after it was revealed in March that Clinton used a private server to handle her work-related email as secretary, she insisted at a press conference that there was no need for concern about classified information.

"I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email," she said. "There is no classified material. So, I'm certainly well aware of the classification requirements and did not send classified material."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCullough's letter does not allege specifically that Clinton sent classified information from her private account. While it is possible she only received it, the inspector general said the State Department believes "there are potentially hundreds of classified emails within the approximately 30,000 provided by former Secretary Clinton."

Clinton addressed the new reports briefly Friday, but she did not reiterate her claim that nothing on her server was classified.

"I want to say a word about what's in the news today. It's because there have been a lot of inaccuracies....Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," the Democratic presidential candidate said as she began a speech on economic policy in New York City. "We all have a responsibility to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails. I have said repeatedly that i will answer questions before the house [Benghazi] committee. We are all accountable to get the facts right. I will do my part, but I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

Clinton handed over a trove of business-related emails to the department in December, generating controversy after she said she and her attorney had destroyed any emails that they deemed personal in nature.

A lengthy review ensued to screen for classified material before public release. In May, when the agency released the first batch of Clinton emails, it said it had designated a portion of one email as secret at the request of the FBI. When a second, larger batch was released last month, State deemed 25 of the emails "confidential" — the lowest tier of classification.

However, McCullough's finding is notable because he is asserting that at least some of the information was classified at the time it was sent, although he did not say whether Clinton sent or only received such emails. All of the emails released thus far are at least a couple of years old and State officials had insisted that some of the materials could have become more sensitive over time, resulting in a change to their classification.

McCullough spokeswoman Andrea Williams said Friday that was, in fact, not the case. "To be clear – the four emails mentioned...were classified when they were sent and are classified now," she said.

However, State Department spokesman Mark Toner said Friday his agency remained unconvinced that any of Clinton's emails should have been considered classified when they were sent. "To our knowledge, none of them needed to be classified at the time," Toner told reporters at a daily briefing.

Still, the question of what information on Clinton's account is and isn't classified and what its status was at the time, remains a subject of some dispute.

McCullough said in the letter that he found that one of State's public releases of emails in recent months under the Freedom of Information Act resulted in disclosure of classified information. While the inspector general said the intelligence community had made "a definitive determination" that the information was classified, State has continued to deny that any breaches occurred when the agency posted several thousand pages of Clinton emails on its website in May and June.

Other documents made public Friday show the classification issue triggered debate even within the agency. Some at State wanted to deem even more of Clinton's emails classified than the agency ultimately did, according to a memo from McCullough's office posted online by the department's inspector general.

In at least four instances, lawyers at Foggy Bottom headed off the classifications by proposing another way to keep the information from the public, the document said.

For Clinton, the previously-undisclosed changes minimized the public relations hit she took with the May email release. Instead of stories saying five emails in that Libya-related set were classified, news accounts noted that a single email out of the 296 released was withheld on national security grounds.

Clinton's decision to use a private server for all of her government and personal emails has been a continuing political controversy for her, seized on by Republicans as evidence that she violated government guidelines.

However, the new disclosures also underscore the subjective nature of the classification system and could be seen as supporting Clinton's claim that she had no reason to believe any of the information on her personal account was classified.

"State Department FOIA personnel recommended five B1 (Classified National Security Information) FOIA exemptions for proposed redactions in the first set of 296 emails to protect classified information. According to State FOIA personnel, during the State Department Legal Office's review, four of the Bl exemptions were removed and changed to B5 FOIA exemptions (Privileged Communications)," a June 15 memo from the Intelligence Community inspector general said.

The decision to deem the records legally privileged as internal government communications, rather than classified, allowed the information to be deleted from the FOIA records posted on State's website. However, the move also minimized the degree to which Clinton appeared to have mishandled the records. In addition, the shift minimized the appearance that the State Department itself did something wrong when it sent the 296 emails to the House Benghazi Committee without designating any of them as classified.

Whatever public relations benefit Clinton or State got from the maneuver was short-lived: when State released another batch of Clinton emails at the end of June, 25 more were deemed classified.

With a criminal investigation into the presence of classified information in the Clinton emails now potentially looming, the internal waffling at State on the classification issue does offer another benefit for Clinton and those who corresponded with her. It underscores why prosecutors so rarely bring charges over mishandling of classified information—especially when it is not explicitly marked as such.

Deeming emails classified years after they were sent creates due process problems that could doom any such prosecution. However, to Republican lawmakers and some voters, the episode could still reinforce the view that Clinton showed poor judgment by relying on a private email account..

Since State first deemed some of the information classified two months ago, her aides have said she had no reason to think the information was classified at the time she received it. Indeed, some—but not all—of the emails State deemed classified were explicitly marked as "sensitive but unclassified."

After the New York Times reported the criminal referral from the inspectors generals, Clinton campaign spokesman Nick Merrill issued a statement early Friday that Clinton "followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials."

"As has been reported on multiple occasions, any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted," Merrill added.

Asked Friday about the reason State backed off some of the proposed classifications, a State spokesman pointed to a July 14 memo from Undersecretary for Management Patrick Kennedy. In it, he said that two of the four emails were in relevant part duplicates and that the potential classification was proposed by State's Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs.

"NEA consulted with the Office of the Legal Adviser regarding FOIA exemptions that were potentially available," Kennedy wrote. "NEA decided, consistent with the Attorney General's 2009 FOIA guidance, to redact certain limited information under exemption 5 which reflected deliberations among policy officials."

Kennedy also disclosed that one email relating to the Department of Defense was proposed for classification, but the Pentagon decided not to pursue it. As a result the only email in the first, Libya-related batch to be deemed classified dealt with the reported arrests of suspects in the Benghazi attack, classified at the FBI's request.

One prominent classification expert said the back-and-forth underscores the arbitrariness and subjectivity of the classification system.

"Classification decisions are matters of judgment, not calculation," said Steven Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists. "It is entirely possible for two senior officials to disagree about the need for classifying a particular item of information."

Hillary Clinton slogs through another email frenzy // CNN // Stephen Collinson and Tom LoBianco - July 24, 2015

It was just another frenzied Friday in Clinton World.

Two apparent blockbuster revelations emerged in the email controversy hounding Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign. But on later inspection, they seemed to be much less damning than they first appeared.

The campaign's tortured relations with the press meanwhile took another disastrous turn with spokesman Nick Merrill lashing reporters for using "reckless, inaccurate leaks from partisan sources."

And through it all, the candidate herself sailed into a room at New York University, in her customary spot in the eye of the political storm -- apparently unperturbed and ready to reel off a wonk-heavy speech on tax and the economy.

"Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," Clinton said, with more than a trace of contempt for the hysteria erupting around her at an unwelcome time as polls suggest her trustworthiness is taking a fresh battering.

By the end of the day, the Clinton campaign appeared to have capitalized on media missteps to limit immediate new damage to her presidential hopes. But the dizzying catalog of revelations and campaign counter attacks was another sign that the festering fight over the private email server she used while running U.S. diplomacy will confound her presidential quest for months to come.

It all started late on Thursday night with an apparent New York Times bombshell.

The paper reported that independent inspectors general had asked the Justice Department for a criminal probe of Clinton's email use while secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hitting back

The Clinton campaign hit back hard, quickly getting the Times to soften the lead of its story to make clear the requested probe was not of Clinton herself, but into whether emails connected to her were mishandled. The distinction was important because the latter formulation of any eventual Justice Department inquiry could conceivably give Clinton personal distance from any wrongdoing.

Throughout Friday morning, Clinton's press aides pushed back on the report, shipping reporters a tweet by former Nevada political pundit Jon Ralston that the Times failure to correct its story was "just so, so dumb."

When the Times did decide to correct its story later Friday, it offered some critical vindication to Clinton, at least for the time being.

"Here we are yet again correcting a story," Clinton's senior spokeswoman Karen Finney said on CNN.

Clinton got in her own dig Friday afternoon just before her speech on middle class economics but did not take questions from reporters.

She complained about "a lot of inaccuracies" in reporting on the emails and said she had repeatedly offered to testify before a congressional committee on the private server she used as secretary of state.

As Washington digested the showdown with the Times, a rival paper, the Wall Street Journal, busted out its own email expose.

The paper said that Clinton, despite her denials, had indeed emailed some classified information from her private account while secretary of state -- a possibility that could land Clinton in legal as well as political jeopardy.

But again, the revelation turned out to be less immediately damaging than it had first seemed.

In a letter to Congress, the inspector general for the intelligence community, Charles McCullough, said that some material Clinton sent from her server was indeed classified -- but was not identified as such.

Because it was not identified, it is unclear whether Clinton realized she was potentially compromising classified information -- again offering her a possible defense.

Turf war

That opened the way for Finney to portray the whole affair as just a turf war between intelligence and State Department officials about what information should be kept secret.

The Justice Department, meanwhile, clarified that it was considering a probe of Clinton's email practices, but not a "criminal" probe.

As is so often the case in the myriad scandals, controversies and pseudo-scandals that have swirled around the Clintons for decades, the disclosures left the situation murkier than it had been before and clouded in a flurry of complicated details likely to confuse the average voter.

And while there did not appear to be sufficient material to seriously damage or even doom Clinton's political career, there was just enough confusion to offer fresh ammunition for her enemies. The Clinton email episode also mirrors the 1990s Clinton scandals in the hyper partisan emotions it stirs -- and the way it never really seems to go away, but also never reaches a climax.

The latest cycle of allegations and counter attacks from the Clinton campaign comes when there is an increasing focus on how the former secretary of state's character could complicate her presidential efforts.

Three new opinion polls in swing states Iowa, Colorado and Virginia this week showed that Clinton was trailing several leading Republican candidates including Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio and Scott Walker in a hypothetical match-up for the White House. While the general election is 16 months away, the polls pointed to a possible personal vulnerability for Clinton as majorities of voters in all three states said she was not honest and trustworthy.

And the media fixation on such episodes claimed another victim -- any coverage Clinton could have expected for her big speech -- an economic argument she is putting at the center of her campaign.

While most of her potential Republican rivals were content to let Clinton stew in the spotlight, the Republican National Committee used the latest spate of scandal fever to jab the Democratic front runner.

Clinton has struggled for decades to shake off political attacks painting her as secretive, obstructive and dishonest -- and the email saga and rows over the source of foreign donations to her family's philanthropic organization have ensured a similar theme undercuts her 2016 presidential campaign.

RNC chair Reince Priebus said that Clinton's "desire to play by her own rules" may have exposed classified information -- adding "a full investigation by the Justice Department is not just needed, but required."

Republican political consultant Katie Packer previewed the way Republican candidates are likely to exploit Friday's drama as Clinton's email problem lingers.

"In terms of the way the American people view her, they already have questions about whether she can be trusted. She has shown a propensity to lie when things get uncomfortable," Gage said.

Official: Clinton emails included classified information // CNN // Elise Labott - July 24, 2015

The inspector general for the intelligence community has informed members of Congress that some material Hillary Clinton emailed from her private server contained classified information, but it was not identified that way.

Because it was not identified, it is unclear whether Clinton realized she was potentially compromising classified information.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The IG reviewed a "limited sampling" of her emails and among those 40 reviewed found that "four contained classified [intelligence community] information," wrote the IG Charles McCullough in a letter to Congress.

McCullough noted that "none of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings" but that some "should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked, and transmitted via a secure network."

The four emails in question "were classified when they were sent and are classified now," spokeswoman Andrea Williams told CNN.

McCullough said that State Department Freedom of Information Act officials told the intelligence community IG that "there are potentially hundreds of classified emails within the approximately 30,000 provided by former Secretary Clinton."

Clinton knocks 'inaccuracies' in reports

Clinton on Friday criticized what she called "a lot of inaccuracies" in brief remarks about the classified emails.

She added that she had released 500 pages of emails and that "I've said repeatedly that I will answer questions" posed by a congressional panel.

"But I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families," she said.

In the past, Clinton has denied sending classified information from her personal sever.

"I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email," Clinton said at a news conference in March. "I'm certainly well aware of the classified requirements and did not send classified material."

The Journal story broke just as the Justice Department issued a statement correcting earlier reports that the probe into email from Clinton's server during her time as secretary of state was a criminal investigation.

Instead, a Justice Department official said that the agency had "received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information."

The New York Times first reported late Thursday that inspectors general for the intelligence community and the State Department have asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation into Clinton's possible mishandling of classified email. The Times significantly revised its story Friday to say the matter was referred to Justice to examine whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with Clinton's account -- but not necessarily by Clinton.

Sources confirmed both inspectors general have asked DOJ to open an investigation. The inspectors general are independent officials who conduct audits, investigations and inspections in the agencies for which they're responsible.

No decision yet to launch probe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There has not yet been a decision on whether to launch a criminal probe.

In response, Clinton campaign spokesman Nick Merrill issued a statement that "It is now more clear than ever that The New York Times report claiming there is a criminal inquiry sought in Hillary Clinton's use of email is false."

He added, "This incident shows the danger of relying on reckless, inaccurate leaks from partisan sources."

The request for the Justice Department investigation came after a June 29 memo from the State Department's inspector general stating a review of 55,000 pages of Clinton e-mails found "hundreds of potentially classified emails within the collection."

A follow-up memo from both the State Department and intelligence community inspectors general to Undersecretary of State Patrick Kennedy on July 17 said they had received confirmation that "several of the emails contained classified (Intelligence Community) information, though they were not marked as classified. At least one of the emails has been released to the public" by the State Department. Officials were additionally concerned that possible classified material would be posted in future releases of Clinton's emails.

Clinton's use of the personal account for official business instead of a State Department one stirred up a political storm around the 2016 Democratic presidential contender after news of it emerged in March.

Republicans criticize Clinton

The reported request for an inquiry is likely to renew fierce Republican criticism of Clinton's email practices.

Following the Times report this morning, GOP congressional leaders began launching attacks.

House Speaker John Boehner of Ohio released a statement calling on her to relinquish her server and questioning her judgment.

"If Secretary Clinton truly has nothing to hide, she can prove it by immediately turning over her server to the proper authorities and allowing them to examine the complete record," he said.

"What these reports demonstrate is the inherent risk of conducting our nation's diplomacy and foreign policy on your home email and personal server," he continued. "Her poor judgment has undermined our national security."

South Carolina Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the Select Committee on Benghazi, echoed Boehner.

"The best -- the only way -- to resolve these important factual questions is for her to turn over her server to the proper authorities for independent forensic evaluation," he said in a statement.

The top Democrat on the Benghazi Committee, however, pushed back on the attacks.

"I spoke personally to the State Department Inspector General on Thursday, and he said he never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage," said Maryland Rep. Elijah Cummings. "Instead, he told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the FOIA review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified."

Kerry asked for recommendations from inspector

The State Department in May began publicly releasing some of the tens of thousands of emails from the private account that Clinton handed over to it in December.

Officials from the department have been reviewing and redacting the huge collection of documents before putting them in the public domain.

Clinton has said she has nothing to hide and would like the process of making the emails public to be expedited.

Clinton's successor as secretary of state, John Kerry, wrote to the State Department inspector general in March asking for recommendations on the department's practices on document retention and its freedom of information process, a senior state department official told CNN.

"The Inspector General's assistance is welcomed as we take efforts to improve our policies with respect to the preservation of records in a digital environment," the official said.

Clinton focuses on economy amid email controversy // CNN // Dan Merica and Eric Brader - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton and her campaign aides on Friday tried to keep the focus of her economic speech at New York University on corporate culture and "short term speculation," but the latest chapter in the story of her private email use at the State Department unfolded as the former secretary of state took the stage.

The split-screen feeling of the event was palpable: As Clinton said it was time for U.S. companies to "break free from the tyranny of today's earnings report so they can do what they do best, innovate, invest and build tomorrow's prosperity," her aides issued statements about the former first lady's private server and said it contained classified information that was not correctly identified.

Clinton opened her event with brief remarks about the email controversy -- saying she "will do my part" to cooperate with any inquiries into her email use while leading the State Department -- but quickly and deliberately turned to the economy. She told the audience of students, professors and supporters that she was "going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

"It is clear that the system is out of balance," Clinton said of a corporate culture that stresses short-term gain over long term investment.

"It is time to start measuring value in terms of years," not days, Clinton added.

Clinton's speech, however, was short on rhetoric aimed directly at Wall Street and big banks, something progressives are hungry to see from the former New York senator who has deep ties to the financial industry. Clinton's aides set expectations early, telling reporters before the speech that Friday's event would not be chock full of the Wall Street red meat that liberals are pining for.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, Clinton outlined a series of policy proposals that she hopes would rebuild "a connection between companies and their workers, so that workers are seen as assets rather than costs," her campaign aides said.

"It's time to return to an old-fashioned idea," Clinton said, "that companies' responsibility to their shareholders also encompasses a responsibility to employees, customers, communities and ultimately to our country, and yes, our planet."

Clinton notably endorsed New York City's plan of raising the minimum wage to $15 an hour for fast food workers, but did not go as far as endorsing a $15 federal minimum wage.

"The national minimum wage is a floor, and it needs to be raised, but let's also remember that the cost of living in Manhattan is different than in Little Rock and in many other places, so New York or Los Angeles or Seattle are right to go higher," Clinton said.

Clinton proposed reforming taxes on capital gains, the earnings people make when they sell stock. Instead of the current system, which defines a long-term investment as anything over a year, Clinton said as president she would define a long-term investment as six years.

The former secretary of state said she would put capital gains tax on a sliding scale: Long-term investments would be taxed at 24%, the current rate. The rate would continue to slide up until short-term investments were taxed at 39.6%, regular income to top earners.

The former secretary of state also called for reviewing securities rules to hold management accountable, altering the tax codes so that executive compensation focuses more on long-term investment and ending subsidies to "industries that are already thriving" like oil companies.

"Thirty years ago top CEOs made 50 times what a typical worker did," Clinton said. "Today they make 300 times more. That just doesn't make sense."

The campaign has been working with dozens of economists to sketch out Clinton's economic platform. Outside advisers have included a host of liberal economists, former government officials and more. Among them are the Noble Prize-winning economist Joseph Stiglitz, top Obama economic policy aides Gene Sperling, Christina Romer, David Kamin and Alan Krueger.

Austan Goolsbee, a professor of economics at the University of Chicago and a former economic advisor to President Barack Obama, heralded Clinton's speech as "the start of an important conversation on how we can get our economy -- private-sector businesses, investors and the government -- more oriented toward growth."

"Her plans to reform the capital gains tax system to encourage longer-term investment is designed to give incentives for investors and companies to focus on long-lasting value rather than just near term benefits," he said. "This one policy alone will not solve the problem of short-termism but aligning our tax code toward long-term thinking is a worthy and important goal and it is a beginning."

Progressive opponents take aim at Wall Street

Clinton's speech was intended to challenge corporate culture, but it didn't offer the direct confrontation of Wall Street that many liberals say they want.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has seized the progressive mantel, inching closer to Clinton in polls from the key early-voting Democratic primary states Iowa and New Hampshire in no small part through rhetorical swings at monied interests.

And former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley on Thursday, speaking at an event at the Center for National Policy, called for the reinstitution of the Glass-Steagall Act -- which separated commercial and investment banks until its repeal under President Bill Clinton.

O'Malley has also called for rules that designed stop regulators from accepting jobs at top financial firms.

"We have come a long way since the financial crisis, but our economy is still vulnerable to another collapse, and we haven't been able to rein in Wall Street misconduct," O'Malley said Thursday. "That's why every Democrat who is running for President needs to commit to finishing the job that Dodd-Frank started."

Progressive Change Campaign Committee co-founder Adam Green lauded O'Malley in a statement Thursday, crediting the former Baltimore mayor and Maryland governor for leading on economic issues -- even though he's struggled to gain traction in polls of Democratic primary voters.

"Martin O'Malley was the first candidate to make criminal prosecution of Wall Street bankers a 2016 issue -- and it's been great to see a race to the top with Clinton and Sanders making bold statements in favor of accountability for bankers who break the law," Green said.

In a speech this month, Clinton called for the prosecution of individuals -- not just firms -- responsible for financial misdeeds.

Her campaign didn't say, though, whether she'll support the reinstitution of the Glass-Steagall Act, which many liberals see as key to preventing a repeat of the 2008 financial collapse.

Clinton did not mention the Depression Era law at all during her New York speech and on Thursday in South Carolina said economic issue are "much more complicated ... than pointing to any one piece of legislation and saying well if we just pass that everything would be fine."

"If you go back and look at what happened in the great recession, it was mortgage companies, it was insurance companies, it was non-commercial banking entities, who were as big if not bigger contributors to the collapse," Clinton said. "So I am not interested in just saying there is one answer to the too-big-to-fail problem."

Clinton kept the press at arms length on Friday. After she finished speaking, she worked the rope line and took selfies with supporters. Clinton's advance staff deliberately kept the press their designated area, not wanting them to approach the presidential candidate.

How Hillary Clinton plans to 'save capitalism' // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald - July 24, 2015

As she tried to look past the latest controversy over her private email server, Hillary Clinton said in a speech Friday that she wants to "save capitalism for the 21st century" by pushing investors and corporations to focus more on long-term growth than making a quick buck.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some activists had hoped and expected Clinton would present a more robust plan on Wall Street, but instead she took on “quarterly capitalism” – the obsession with share prices and quarterly earnings over real value creation, which Clinton views as dangerous to the economy.

To change the incentives, Clinton proposed raising capital gains taxes on investments held for only short periods of time. The tax on investment earnings would nearly double from their current rate of 20% for investments held less than two years. And the rate for those in the top tax bracket would be set on a sliding scale, with incentives for people who hold their investments longer.

Meanwhile, Clinton said she would change the tax code to eliminate incentives for CEOs to be paid based on short-term bumps in share prices, with the aim of encouraging leaders to plan more strategically for the future.

Clinton also took on what she called “hit and run” shareholders – activist investors who pressure corporations to jack up their share prices or pay more dividends to investors, even if it doesn’t help the company in the long run.

At the same time, Clinton addressed the union-backed push to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour.

Clinton said she that while she supports the effort in New York City, the latest focal point in the movement, she’s unsure about making the federal minimum wage $15. “I agree with New York’s proposal this week to raise wages for fast food workers to $15 an hour,” she said. “The national minimum wage is a floor and it needs to be raised, but let’s also remember that the cost of living in Manhattan is different than in Little Rock and many other places. So New York or Los Angles or Seattle are right to go higher.”

Clinton spoke for about 35 minutes at New York University’s Stern School of Business, in front of an audience of about 200 policy experts, members of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and other friends of the campaign.

While Clinton called for “new, creative, disruptive ideas to save capitalism,” it was not the speech some progressives had hoped for. Many had anticipated that Clinton would use the speech to explain how she would take on the financial sector. But Wall Street was hardly a factor in her remarks. Her only direct mention of regulation was to warn that Republicans would roll back Dodd-Frank, which was passed five years ago, if they regained the White House.

Some liberals were disappointed. “Working to end short-termism on Wall Street will definitely help working families in important way,” said Democracy for America executive director Charles Chamberlain. “But let’s be really clear: The Democratic Party doesn’t want, and the American people don’t need, another Democratic President who tip-toes around Wall Street’s insatiable greed.”

“Today’s speech hits those notes in some ways, but fails to do so in others,” he added.

Clinton’s Democratic rivals Bernie Sanders and Martin O’Malley have been much more outspoken on Wall Street reform, calling for criminal penalties against executives who contributed to the Great Recession and demanding that the largest banks be broken up. On Thursday, O’Malley gave a speech on Wall Street reform that he hoped would contrast with Clinton’s and present him as a leader on the issue.

Another liberal group, the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, essentially gave Clinton an incomplete. “We look forward to the Clinton campaign’s big speech on systemic reforms, and the American public will look to see if she is willing to challenge Wall Street power,” said Adam Green, the group’s co-founder, suggesting Friday’s speech was not the one he was looking for.

Many of the ideas Clinton did lay out Friday already have substantial support in the financial world, as Politico reported, making them safer territory for the former secretary of state to endorse.

Clinton's campaign promises more ideas on Wall Street reform will come later.

New allegations on Clinton emails start to unravel // MSNBC // Steve Benen - July 24, 2015

Last night, the New York Times ran an exclusive report that seemed quite important, especially as it relates to the leading Democratic presidential candidate.

Two inspectors general have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether Hillary Rodham Clinton mishandled sensitive government information on a private email account she used as secretary of state, senior government officials said Thursday.

Soon after, however, the story, the headline, and even the url changed without explanation. Now, the article begins this way:

Two inspectors general have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account Hillary Rodham Clinton used as secretary of state, senior government officials said Thursday.

Politico noticed the "significant changes" to the Times' original reporting – the first report suggested Clinton could be the target of the potential criminal probe, while the second, revised report did not.

A U.S. official, meanwhile, told the Associated Press that the referral from the inspectors general "doesn't necessarily suggest wrongdoing by Clinton herself."

Oh. Well, that's pretty far afield from what the Times first reported last night. In fact, what we appear to have are questions about whether the State Department mis-classified some sensitive materials. That may be fascinating to observers who study the executive bureaucracy at a granular level, but for everyone else, there doesn't appear to be much here. Indeed, the original effort to suggest Clinton was personally facing a possible criminal probe, at least given what we now know, seems quite irresponsible.

Nick Merrill, a Clinton spokesperson, added in an official statement, "Contrary to the initial story, which has already been significantly revised, she followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials. As has been reported on multiple occasions, any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted."

As for who fed the New York Times this story in the first place, Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.), the ranking member of the Benghazi Select Committee, issued a statement this morning that not only further disputes the original allegations, but seems to point the finger in a specific direction:

"I spoke personally to the State Department Inspector General on Thursday, and he said he never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage. Instead, he told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the FOIA review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified.

"The Benghazi Select Committee has obtained zero evidence that any emails to or from Secretary Clinton were marked as classified at the time they were transmitted, although some have been retroactively classified since then. This is the latest example in a series of inaccurate leaks to generate false front-page headlines – only to be corrected later – and they have absolutely nothing to do with the attacks in Benghazi or protecting our diplomatic corps overseas."

Update: The Justice Department confirmed this morning that the referral in this matter is unrelated to alleged criminal activity. The Times' reference to "criminal investigation" was incorrect.

Hillary Clinton proposes sharp increase in short-term capital gains taxes // NBC // Everett Rosenfeld - July 24, 2015

Presidential contender Hillary Clinton announced a proposal Friday afternoon to raise capital gains taxes for assets that are held for less than six years by top-bracket payers as a way to try and encourage long-term investing, and grow the economy. (Tweet This)

Clinton's plan specifically seeks to double the period of time for the 39.6 percent top capital gains rate (from up to a year to up to two years), and then institute a sliding rate scale until assets are held for more than six years.

"The current definition of a long-term holding period—just one year—is woefully inadequate," Clinton said. "That may count as long term for my baby granddaughter, but not for the American economy. It's no way to run a tax system."

After that six-year point, those gains would face the current 20 percent tax rate.

Clinton's proposal comes as part of her plan to fight what she sees as an excessive focus on quick profits in capital markets.

Citing recent surveys of corporate executives, Clinton highlighted the pressures of short-term targets over long term growth, saying that her plan would help fix that problem.

"It is clear that the system is out of balance, the deck is stacked in too many ways, and powerful pressures and incentives are pushing it even further out of balance," she said. "Quarterly capitalism as developed over recent decades is neither legally required nor economically sound...and fixing it will be good for everyone."

"Real value comes from long-term growth, not short-term profits," she added. "American business needs to break from from the tyranny of today's earning report."

Clinton said she would look to address "very short-term trading" conducted over "days, hours, or even milliseconds."

The presidential contender also proposed eliminating capital gains taxes for some long-term investments in innovative start ups and struggling communities.

"Of course I understand that these changes to the tax code alone will not shift investors' focus from short term to long term overnight, but I believe this reform is an important first step toward removing some of the incentives that push us toward quarterly capitalism," Clinton said, explaining that she plans to propose more reforms later in her campaign.

Clinton's speech also featured an attack on "hit and run activists" who focus on extracting as much value as quickly as possible from companies "no matter how much it discourages and distracts management from pursuing strategies that would add the most long-term value for the company."

She cited iconic companies like Apple and Dow Chemical that "have felt this pressure." (Activists Carl Icahn and Dan Loeb have been involved in Apple and Dow, respectively.)

"So we need a new generation of committed, long-term investors to provide a counter-weight to the hit-and-run activists," Clinton said.

Hillary Clinton: Report of Email Probe Has 'a Lot of Inaccuracies' // NBC // Kristen Welker - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton said Friday that a New York Times report of a potential criminal probe related to a private email account she used as Secretary of State contains "a lot of inaccuracies."

The newspaper has issued a correction to a piece published late Thursday night alleging that Clinton's email practices were the subject of a criminal investigation proposed by two inspectors general.

"Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," Clinton said before remarks on the economy in New York City. "We all have a responsibility to get this right."

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right and I will do my part, but I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families," she added.

The comments come after the New York Times initially reported that the Justice Department received a "criminal referral" to open an investigation into whether Clinton mishandled government information with her personal account.

The request was made by inspectors general for the State Department and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, the newspaper reported.

In its correction, the New York Times wrote that its initial report, "using information from senior government officials, misstated the nature of the referral to the Justice Department regarding Hillary Clinton's personal email account while she was secretary of state. The referral addressed the potential compromise of classified information in connection with that personal email account. It did not specifically request an investigation into Mrs. Clinton."

The Justice Department initially confirmed the report of a "criminal referral" to NBC News and other outlets. But a Justice Department official said Friday afternoon that "The Department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information. It is not a CRIMINAL referral."

Also on Friday, Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the House committee investigating the Benghazi attacks, said that the State Department's inspector general told him that he did not ask the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation into Clinton's email.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Instead, he told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the FOIA review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified," he said.

In a joint statement, the two inspectors general who made the referral said that it was "a security referral made for counterintelligence purposes." But, they added, they found that a sample of 40 of Clinton's emails from Clinton's server contained four with classified information that should "never have been transmitted via an unclassified personal system."

Clinton said in March that "I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email. There is no classified material."

Hillary Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill blasted the New York Times in a statement.

"It is now more clear than ever that the New York Times report claiming there is a criminal inquiry sought in Hillary Clinton's use of email is false," he said. "It has now been discredited both by the Justice Department and the Ranking Member of the House Oversight Committee. This incident shows the danger of relying on reckless, inaccurate leaks from partisan sources."

Will Hillary's econ speech bring together Democrats? // NBC // Ben White - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton will take a big step into the Wall Street policy world on Friday with a speech at New York University in which she will suggest raising capital gains taxes on investors who hold shares for less than a couple of years.

Clinton also plans to criticize other elements of what she calls "quarterly capitalism," including the current pace of corporate share buybacks and the tactics of activists like Carl Icahn who pressure executives to return cash to shareholders instead of invest it in new plants, equipment, research and employees.

The NYU speech will not be Clinton's big "taking on Wall Street" moment, aides tell me. That will come later with remarks on addressing so-called "Too Big to Fail" banks and punishing corporate crime.

The Friday speech instead is intended, in part, to wed two wings of the Democratic Party that are miles apart right now, the "growth" wing and the "fairness" wing. Fairness Democrats, who thrill to the every word of Elizabeth Warren and Bernie Sanders, want higher taxes on the rich, strong new Wall Street reform and a relentless focus on economic inequality. Growth Democrats, who you don't hear much from anymore, want some of this, too, but prefer a focus on economic policies aimed at growing the pie rather than redistributing the slices.

Read MoreTrump won't win, but yes, he matters

The Friday speech will be remarkably wonky for a presidential candidate and will reflect a policy approach favored for years by the likes of veteran Democratic wonks Gene Sperling and Neera Tanden. It's not often you will hear a major presidential candidate going into significant detail on share buyback transparency. But I'm told Clinton began to focus on the problem of slack corporate investment last fall and has been drilling deep into the details for months.

The address is intended to focus on long-term growth by trying to encourage buy-and-hold investing and taking pressure off corporate managements to focus on quarterly earnings per share targets at all costs. And it is intended to appeal to fairness Democrats by raising some capital gains taxes paid by top earners while also taking some shots at CEO pay and "hit-and-run" hedge funds.

The speech may fail to thrill the Warren crowd because Clinton is not likely to pitch the approach as a way to raise significant new revenue for the government. Instead she may suggest that increased revenues could be used for other incentives in the tax code to encourage business investment over buybacks and dividends.

Still, she won't suggest lowering capital gains for investors who hold for very long periods, something many growth Democrats favor but the left would sharply reject as a tax cut for the very wealthy.

Clinton's formal and informal advisers acknowledge that tinkering with capital gains rates will not instantly solve the problem of "quarterly capitalism" or the lack of significant business investment. But they view it as a smart approach to take what is already a graduated scale for capital gains and tilt it more toward long-term holdings. And it is just the start of what will be a series of speeches aimed at using both government levers and political persuasion to alter the focus of corporate America.

"This is a theme she has identified and she clearly wants to orient the economy toward long-term growth and investment," Austan Goolsbee, a University of Chicago professor and former senior economic adviser to President Barack Obama, told me this week. "and this is a solid, market-based approach to doing that."

What the Clinton Email Story Might — or Might Not — Mean // NBC // Chuck Tod, Mark Murray, and Carrie Dann - July 24, 2015

The Holy Grail or much ado about nothing? Late last night, the New York Times released this bombshell report: "Criminal Inquiry Sought in Hillary Clinton's Use of Email," and the story said that two inspectors general asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether Hillary Clinton herself mishandled sensitive government information regarding her emails. But later, the Times made some small -- but potentially significant -- changes to the story. The new headline: "Criminal Inquiry Is Sought in Clinton Email Account," and the story said the criminal investigation was about "whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection" with Clinton's email account. Bottom line: We don't seem to know the target of this requested investigation. Is it Clinton herself in dealing with classified information over her private email server? Or is the target someone else (in the State Department?) regarding the emails and their classification status? Politically, the semantics might not matter. But legally and journalistically, the semantics matter a great deal. Either this could be the GOP's Holy Grail in reshuffling the entire Democratic race. Or it could be much ado about nothing -- that is, a bureaucratic mistake. And there are two people who can help answer this question: The inspector generals at the State Department and the intelligence agencies. Note: There is no formal investigation at this time.

NBC has updated our story, too

NBC News confirmed the original New York Times story, but we changed our story, too, after doubts about the actual target of the requested probe. That said, the Clinton campaign didn't respond to multiple requests for comment until this morning. Here is our updated story.

Justice Department -- Under Pressure

If the target is Clinton herself -- and again there's a big IF there -- then that will put significant pressure on the Obama Justice Department. Remember, the department has gone out of its way to open investigation into its own officials (see: Petraeus, David). And even if the Justice Department decides not to pursue a criminal investigation, Republicans can say, "Well, Obama's Justice Department is trying to save the Democratic Party's likely presidential nominee." All of that said, until we know the actual target -- Hillary? Someone else in the State Department? -- we just don't whether the story has legs.

Hillary Clinton Isn't Going As Far As Her Democratic Rivals on Minimum Wage // ABC // MaryAlice Parks and Liz Kreutz - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton today came out in support of New York's plan to increase minimum wage for its fast-food workers to $15 an hour -- but the endorsement still places Clinton well behind many of her Democratic challengers on the issue.

"I agree with New York's proposal this week to raise wages for fast food workers to $15 an hour," Clinton said during a speech on corporate culture at New York University.

Clinton said the "national minimum wage is a floor and it needs to be raised," but noted that it can vary based on cost of living in different cities.

"The cost of living in Manhattan is different than Little Rock and many other places, so New York and Los Angeles or Seattle are right to go higher," Clinton added.

While Clinton's support of the $15 minimum wage for some workers in New York is the furthest she has gone yet on the issue of minimum wage, it still falls short of the bar set by some of her Democratic rivals, including Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vermont, and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, both of whom have called for doubling the current federal minimum wage of $7.25 to $15 dollars an hour nationwide.

"I think if you work 40 hours a week you have a right not be living in poverty," Sanders said earlier this week, standing alongside hundreds of low-wage workers who walked out of food service and janitorial jobs at federal buildings in D.C. Sanders, who has centered his campaign on the fight against income inequality, called on the President to act now and only award federal contracts to companies paying higher wages. He also introduced a bill that would a bump the national minimum wage to $15 an hour by 2020.

"Today, we send a very loud message to the U.S. Congress and the president … that all of our workers from coast to coast need at least $15 bucks an hour," he continued.

O'Malley has pushed this issue, too.

As governor, he successfully signed a law increasing the state minimum wage to $10.10 an hour, but on the campaign trail he has repeatedly said he is favor of $15 dollars an hour.

"Some people will say this is hard to do. And it will be. But leadership is about forging public consensus--not following it. On this issue, we must lead with our progressive values to rebuild the American Dream," O'Malley said in the statement Wednesday.

Advocates of a higher minimum wage enjoyed at least one major victory just this week. The Los Angeles County followed the City of Los Angeles and voted in favor of adopting a $15 an hour plan as well.

But recent national polling, suggests Americans are not in favor of such a big hike. According to a CBS News-New York Times poll released in June, while 71 percent support raising the minimum wage, only 38 percent are in favor of "requiring fast food chains and other hourly employers to pay workers at least $15 per hour." Though, according to the same poll, a small majority of Democrats -- 56 percent -- support the idea.

Hillary Clinton: IG's Urge Justice Department to Probe Her Emails // ABC // Justin Fishel and Mike Levine - July 24, 2015

An internal government review of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's controversial private email account concluded that some of those messages contained classified information, senior government officials confirm to ABC News.

The inspectors general for the State Department and Intelligence Community have sent a "referral" to the Justice Department, notifying it of potential national security concerns.

The Justice Department clarified today that the referral is not criminal in nature. The main concern is that classified information could be compromised because it was sent over unsecured networks and remains in the hands of Clinton's legal team, a spokesman for the Intelligence Community's IG told ABC News today.

Clinton Email: Bill vs. Hillary and the Different Ways the Couple Uses It

Hillary Clinton's Emails: Unanswered Questions About Deleted Correspondence

The purpose of notifying the Justice Department was to inform the FBI of "a potential compromise of classified information," spokesman Andrea Williams said.

It was not intended to seek a criminal probe, Williams added.

In a memorandum to the State Department's Under Secretary for Management Patrick Kennedy, the inspectors general said a review of Clinton's emails revealed "hundreds of potentially classified emails within the collection."

It also states that officials within the Intelligence Community confirmed that "that several of these emails contained classified IC information, though they were not marked as classified."

Williams clarified that the intelligence community found four emails out of a batch of 40 that it reviewed containing classified information.

The Clinton campaign said in a statement that Clinton had "followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials."

When it was revealed early in her presidential campaign that she had exclusively used a personal email account during her tenure as Secretary of State, Clinton responded by turning over 55,000 pages of emails to the State Department and asking that it make them public. At the time, she claimed that none of them contained classified information.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since then the State Department has been working with its Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) office to release those emails in tranches, 3,000 of which have already been made public on its website.

The Intelligence Community says that one of those 3,000 emails the State Department put on its FOIA website contained classified information, a concern they also expressed to the Justice Department.

The State Department disputes that claim and maintains that nothing classified in nature has been released to the public.

The Justice Department has not yet decided how it will respond to the the referral.

Hillary Clinton defends Planned Parenthood amid video controversy // CBS // Reena Flores - July 24, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton launched a strong defense of Planned Parenthood while campaigning in South Carolina Thursday, responding to the recent firestorm surrounding the women's health organization and undercover videos released by anti-abortion activists.

"For more than a century, Planned Parenthood has provided essential services for women -- not just reproductive health services, including access to affordable family planning, but cancer screenings for example and other health checkups," Clinton said at a town hall-style event in Greenville. "And I think it is unfortunate that Planned Parenthood has been the object of such a concerted attack for so many years."

The edited videos, the result of a sting operation conducted by the California-based Center for Medical Progress, show undercover actors engaging with top Planned Parenthood officials about buying intact fetal specimens. It is illegal to sell fetal tissue for profit, but federal law allows for tissue donations used for research purposes if the woman undergoing an abortion gives her consent.

Planned Parenthood President Cecile Richards took responsibility and apologized for the "tone and statements" of a staff member in the video, but stressed that the organization follows all laws and ethical guidelines.

Clinton also acknowledged the tone of the staff member and noted that Planned Parenthood had "apologized for the insensitivity of the employee" depicted in the video but denounced the leaked footage as an "attack" on abortion rights.

"It's really an attack against a woman's right to choose, to make the most personal difficult decisions that any woman would face based on her faith and the medical advice that she's given," Clinton said. "So I'm hoping that this situation will not further undermine the very important services that planned parenthood provides across our country."

Other Democrats have rushed to Planned Parenthood's defense, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who has said the "controversy doesn't exist," and White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest.

A congressional investigation is underway to determine whether or not Planned Parenthood's abortion practices violated any federal laws, and the Department of Justice is also expected to review all information regarding the videos.

No criminal probe requested into Hillary Clinton's email, DOJ clarifies // CBS // Paula Reid - July 24, 2015

The Justice Department has received a request to investigate Hillary Clinton's email account, but the department corrected its earlier statement Friday to clarify that the request was not for a criminal investigation.

The request relates to Clinton's use of a private email account for official business while she was secretary of state - which has already come up as an issue in the 2016 campaign. The office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI) confirmed to CBS News that the inspector general for the Intelligence Community [IC] has sent a referral to the Justice Department on the matter.

The story was first reported by The New York Times, citing senior government officials.

The request comes after a conclusion in a June 29 memo by the inspector general for the State Department and the IC inspector general that Clinton's private account had "hundreds of potentially classified emails" in it. The memo was sent to Patrick F. Kennedy, the under secretary of state for management.

In a July 17 letter to Kennedy, the inspectors general wrote that the IC inspector general has received confirmation from IC Freedom of Information Act [FOIA] officials that "several of these emails contained classified IC information, though they were not marked as classified."

Additionally, CBS News has obtained a letter sent Thursday to the leadership of the House and Senate intelligence committees, in which the IC inspector general says some of the emails on Clinton's server "should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked, and transmitted via a secure network." He also reveals that the emails in question were "purported to have been copied to a thumb drive in the possession of former Secretary Clinton's personal counsel, Williams and Connelly attorney David Kendall."

What's not clear is whether any information in the emails was marked as classified by the State Department when Mrs. Clinton sent or received them -- some information could have been retroactively classified. As the Times reported, about two dozen emails were redacted before they were publicly released because they were upgraded to "classified status."

In the Times' initial report, the investigation was described as pertaining to whether Clinton specifically "mishandled sensitive government information." That characterization was changed in a subsequent version of the story.

Before the Justice Department corrected its characterization of the requested probe as "criminal," one Democratic leader in Congress put out a forceful statement that called the story "the latest example in a series of inaccurate leaks to generate false front-page headlines."

Rep. Elijah Cummings of Maryland, the top Democrat on the Benghazi Select Committee, also noted that the State Department inspector general told him personally that "he never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage."

The State Department inspector general -- as the above letters and memos illustrate -- had been working with the IC inspector general to express concerns over potential, unintentional leaks of classified information in the Clinton emails.

While the IC inspector general has asked for a Justice Department probe into the emails, Cummings said there's no evidence Clinton transmitted classified information on her private account.

"The Benghazi Select Committee has obtained zero evidence that any emails to or from Secretary Clinton were marked as classified at the time they were transmitted, although some have been retroactively classified since then," he said.

Since Clinton's use of the private account was revealed in March, she has said repeatedly that the account contained no classified information. She has said using it was a matter of convenience.

"I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House Committee," Clinton said at an event in New York on Friday afternoon. "We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, but also stay focused on issues, big issues."

The Justice Department hasn't decided if it will open a probe, the Justice officials told CBS News.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton's campaign released this statement Friday morning:

"Contrary to the initial story, which has already been significantly revised, she followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials. As has been reported on multiple occasions, any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted."

Hillary Clinton Would Double Taxes on Short-Term Capital Gains // Fox // Dunstan Prial - July 24, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Friday took aim at some of the highest U.S. earners, proposing to nearly double the tax rate on capital gains for stocks that are bought and sold relatively quickly.

In a speech in New York City, Clinton took aim broadly at Wall Street and more narrowly at the niche category of investors – often referred to as activist investors -- who swiftly move in and out of stock positions purely for short-term profits.

Clinton, a former senator from New York and Secretary of State during President Obama's first term, criticized what she repeatedly described as "quarterly capitalism," or the Wall Street-inspired mentality of generating short-term profits to appease shareholders every three months during quarterly earnings.

"American business needs to break free from the tyranny of today's earning report so they can do what they do best: innovate, invest and build tomorrow's prosperity," the Democratic presidential front-runner said. "It's time to start measuring value in terms of years -- or the next decade -- not just next quarter."

Under Clinton's proposal, investments held between one and two years would be taxed at the normal income-tax rate of 39.6%, nearly double the existing 20% capital gains rate.

Only the top 0.5% of taxpayers would be impacted by the plan, which also falls in line with Democratic calls for cracking down on the immense wealth generated by ostensibly manipulative practices on Wall Street.

Activist investors have been criticized in recent months for running destructive campaigns against companies purely in an effort to reap personal gains from stock moves prompted by their actions.

Clinton's plan would collect revenue from top-bracket taxpayers' stock holdings on a sliding scale, with the lowest rate applied to investments held the longest. To qualify for the existing 20% rate, investors would have to hold an investment for at least six years.

Clinton said the all-consuming effort by corporations to generate short-term profits is harming the economy because companies are focusing on quarterly earnings rather than expansion and hiring.

Clinton also spoke out in favor of a $15 an hour minimum wage, which many business leaders have argued will force layoffs rather than improve the lives of minimum wage workers.

Stock buybacks by companies also came under criticism by the Democratic hopeful, who said the money that companies use to buy back stock and reward shareholders might be better spent on research and development.

Clinton's plan would impact taxes for the top-tier taxpayers who hold investments for anywhere between two and six years. Stocks and other investments held for two to three years would be taxed at 36%; those held three to four years would face a tax of 32%. The sliding scale ends at six years.

New York Times Corrects Explosive Hillary Clinton Email Story Amid Campaign Pushback // HuffPo // Michael Calderone and Sam Stein - July 24, 2015

An explosive New York Times story detailing a potential probe of Hillary Clinton's use of a private email account unravelled quickly on Friday morning, prompting questions about how inaccurate, politically sensitive information could end up in the paper of record.

At issue was a Times breaking news alert sent out in the late hours of Thursday evening, reporting that inspectors general were asking the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether Clinton sent classified information from her private server. By the next day, the story had changed, slightly but significantly. The subject of the investigation wasn't Clinton, per se, but whether she was on the receiving end of the information in question. Hours later, it changed again, this time more significantly. The Department of Justice said that the probe requested wasn't criminal in nature, but rather investigative. And then, it grew even more complicated, with the State Department inspector general saying they didn't even ask for an investigation at all.

As the different chapters of this in-the-weeds saga progressed, attention turned to the Times, which has been the tip of the spear in reporting on Clinton's use of a private email account and server. Times reporter Michael Schmidt, who co-bylined Thursday's story, also broke the news in March that Clinton had violated government protocol by exclusively using a private email account at the State Department.

In a correction appended to the Times article online, editors acknowledged having "misstated the nature of the referral" related to Clinton's email use, which the paper had described as "criminal." Though a Department of Justice official initially told reporters the referral was "criminal" in nature after the Times story was published, the agency reversed course and said it was not. Times editors also wrote that the referral from two inspectors general did not "specifically request an investigation" into Clinton.

By midday, the paper was under withering criticism from progressives online, who accused it of sparking a wave of outrage over ultimately faulty charges. Other nonpartisan sources were suggesting that Republicans on the Select Committee investigating the 2012 attacks on the compound in Benghazi were behind the inaccurate leak.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clinton campaign itself wasn't shy about calling the story bunk, pushing back hard on the Times, demanding and receiving a revision in the piece and accusing congressional Republicans of going outside their jurisdictions to attack the former secretary of state.

The avalanche of pushback left the Times in an uncomfortable spot. The paper initially rejected calls to issue a correction. When it was later forced to do so, it seemed unwilling to completely abandon the story. By late Friday afternoon, the paper was still running a headline that labeled the investigation into Clinton's email usage a "criminal inquiry." Its lead sentence also still stated, "Two inspectors general have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation."

A Times spokeswoman did not immediately respond to questions about whether those two elements of the story would be changed.

But even if they are, it's unlikely that the same audience will see the updated version unless the paper were to send out a second breaking news email with its latest revisions. The Clinton story also appeared the front page of Friday's print edition.

For Clinton critics, the dispute over the paper's handling of this news item still obscures the larger problem, which is that as secretary of state, she used a private email account that could have compromised sensitive government information. Indeed, lost in the back-and-forth Friday was a Wall Street Journal story that detailed how several emails containing classified information made it into her inbox. The information wasn't classified at the time, but rather received the designation retroactively.

“None of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings, but some included IC-derived classified information and should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked, and transmitted via a secure network,” wrote Inspector General I. Charles McCullough in a letter to Congress.

The debate over the article also underscores just how delicate reporting on Clinton's email setup has become in the early stages of the presidential campaign.

Each report drops amid a well-established narrative. Clinton is held to an unfair standard by the press and maligned by the right, supporters say. Her email use is indicative of Clintonian paranoia and a penchant for secrecy, critics counter.

And reporters, often relying on anonymous sources, are going to face questions about the motivations of those providing information. They're also likely to encounter intense scrutiny from pro-Clinton organizations like Correct the Record and Media Matters for America. If a story isn’t completely airtight, the campaign and such media watchdogs are sure to pick apart discrepancies, whether minuscule, or in this case, significant. Even a correction doesn't always end the complaints.

Correct the Record slammed the Times’ “bogus” story late Friday afternoon and suggested it fit a pattern of “thin sourcing, excess hype, and a tag-team rollout with the hyper-partisan, Republican-led House Benghazi circus.” Shortly thereafter, Media Matters Chairman David Brock wrote a letter to Times publisher Arthur Sulzberger Jr., urging him to appoint a commission to examine the reporting behind Thursday’s story and three previous Clinton reports the group has also criticized.

"David Brock is a partisan," a Times spokeswoman responded in a statement. "It is not surprising that he is unhappy with some of our aggressive coverage of important political figures. We are proud of that coverage and obviously disagree with his opinion."

Hillary Clinton's Economic Speech A Total Letdown // HuffPo // Zach Carter - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton gave a speech Friday that pledged to combat dodgy corporate management but offered only soft-touch policy solutions that included significant tax breaks for wealthy investors.

Advisors billed the talk as a major rollout of Clinton's economic agenda. The candidate herself pitched her proposals as a way to break from failed policies that had damaged the economy. But the speech eschewed any emphasis on income inequality, runaway finance, companies "too big to fail" or any of the economic issues animating the Democratic Party. Instead, Clinton offered a mild-mannered, small-bore critique of "quarterly capitalism," a common corporate strategy that maximizes short-term profits over long-term investments.

Such short-term thinking is almost universally recognized as a problem. It's just not very high on the list of the country's economic woes. Companies can sacrifice long-term investments and ignore long-term risks by pursuing strategies that maximize returns to shareholders over the next few months. In the long run, that's bad for society and bad for corporate profits.

"Large public companies now return eight or nine out of every 10 dollars they earn directly back to shareholders, either in the form of dividends or stock buybacks which can temporarily boost share prices," Clinton said in the speech. "Last year the total reached a record $900 billion. That doesn't leave much money to build new factory or a research lab or to train workers or to give them a raise."

But Clinton didn't call for corporations to give their workers a raise, or to tie CEO pay to the pay of average workers -- or any other policy that would directly impact economic inequality. Instead, she focused on creating incentives for companies to better profit from longer-term investments. That means tax increases for investors cashing out shorter investments.

She also suggested altogether eliminating taxes on long-term investments in "small businesses," a category she said would include "innovative startups." As she praised early investors "patiently nurturing the next disruptive innovator," Clinton appeared to be simultaneously stroking the egos of wealthy Silicon Valley venture capitalists and offering them a substantial tax cut.

But the rest of her proposal included increases in capital gains taxes for assets wealthy investors hold for less than six years. Clinton's plan would boost capital gains taxes for investments of two years or less to 43.3 percent -- a rate that currently applies only to investments of less than one year. The rate would gradually decrease over time to 23.8 percent after an investment reaches six years.

The populist appeal of increasing capital gains taxes lies in the fact that wealthy people accrue the vast majority of capital gains. Roughly half of all capital gains flow to the richest 0.1 percent of Americans, according to a Washington Post report. But the ultimate effect on inequality would likely be limited -- if rich taxpayers simply don't sell off their stock holdings for a longer time, they'll maintain a low tax rate, resulting in a more rational corporate strategy but similar income distributions.

The problem Clinton is trying to address had been well documented. There has been a decades-long divergence between the money companies borrow and they money they invest, as the Roosevelt Institute's Mike Konczal and J.W. Mason pointed out earlier this year. Rather than raising money to build better businesses, companies are, to a dramatic degree, raising money to pay shareholders.

Clinton wondered whether AT&T would ever have invested in the iconic and innovative Bell Labs in today's pro-shareholder environment and cited survey data that showed more than half of corporate executives would not make a good long-term investment if it meant a short-term loss.

She offered a lot of brand-name love to companies including Trader Joe's, QuikTrip, Chrysler, GM, Target, Starbucks and Chipotle who see their "workers as assets, not costs to be cut," she said. Citing recent wage hikes at McDonald's and WalMart -- which were spurred in part by public pressure -- Clinton said it was time to end wage stagnation.

But just as no single policy can reverse decades of wage stagnation for most Americans, no single tax policy can reserve the decades-long shift in how businesses are run. There's "no single cause, no single solution," Clinton admitted.

Hillary Clinton Pushes Back On Report Of Email Investigation // HuffPo // Sam Levine - July 24, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on Friday said that there had been "a lot of inaccuracies" surrounding a New York Times report that the inspectors general at the State Department and the Intelligence Community had asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal probe into whether emails with classified information had been mishandled in relation to the personal account she used while secretary of state.

Clinton pointed to comments by Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.), the top Democrat on the Select Committee on Benghazi, who said on Friday that the IG had personally told him he did not request a criminal probe. A Justice Department official said in a statement Friday morning that "the Department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information. It is not a criminal referral."

"Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," Clinton said. "We all have a responsibility to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails, I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House committee."

Hillary Clinton said that there had been "a lot of inaccuracies" surrounding a report about an investigation into potentially compromised classified information on her private e-mail server.

The Times issued a correction on the story on Friday, saying that the article "using information from senior government officials, misstated the nature of the referral to the Justice Department regarding Hillary Clinton's personal email account while she was secretary of state. The referral addressed the potential compromise of classified information in connection with that personal email account. It did not specifically request an investigation into Mrs. Clinton."

During a speech on details of her economic policy in New York on Friday, Clinton said that she was being transparent.

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right," Clinton continued. " And I will do my part. But I am also going to stay focused on the issues. Particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

Classified Emails Were Sent Through Clinton's Private Network, Watchdog Says // NPR // Eyder Peralta - July 24, 2015

The Justice Department has received a referral to look into whether classified information was mishandled in relation to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's use of a private email account to conduct official business.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After The New York Times first reported the story, the inspectors general of the State Department and the Intelligence Community made public memos that outline the concerns that led to the referral.

The memos reveal two important things: First, that investigators found that Clinton's private email account contained "hundreds of potentially classified emails." Second, the investigators found that "at least one email made public by the State Department contained classified information."

Andrea Williams, a spokeswoman for the inspector general for the Intelligence Community, told NPR's Carrie Johnson that at least four emails that were sent through Clinton's private email network "were classified when they were sent and are classified now."

On the face of it that seems like a simple statement, but the inspector general also found that all of the emails were not marked as classified. That raises questions about how the State Department and the Intelligence Community handled sensitive information.

The issue of Clinton's private email account has cast controversy over her burgeoning presidential campaign. Clinton, however, has always maintained that she did not break the law when she opted to use a personal email account instead of a State Department account to conduct official business during her tenure as secretary of state.

"I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email," Clinton said at a news conference in March. "There is no classified material. So I'm certainly well-aware of the classification requirements and did not send classified material."

The Clinton campaign issued a statement on Twitter Friday, reiterating that point. Campaign spokesman Nick Merrill said that Clinton had followed "appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials."

He added: "As has been reported on multiple occasions, any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted."

I. Charles McCullough, the Intelligence Community inspector general, seemed to characterize that differently in a Thursday memo to lawmakers: "We note that none of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings, but some included IC-derived classified information and should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked and transmitted via a secure network. Further, my office's limited sampling of 40 of the emails revealed four contained classified IC information which should have been marked and handled at the SECRET level."

It's worth noting that it is still unclear who sent those emails and that the State Department disputes the charges made by the Intelligence Community inspector general,.

During his regularly scheduled briefing, deputy State Department spokesman Mark Toner said they did not believe that Clinton sent classified information through her personal email.

"She's handed over those 55-thousand pages ... to our knowledge, none of that needed to be classified at the time," Toner said. "Some are being upgraded as classified now."

Clinton addressed the reports during a speech Friday afternoon, saying there has been a lot of misinformation.

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right," she said. "But I will do my part, but I am also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

Carrie reports that the Justice Department has received a referral related to the case. The Justice Department had originally said it was a criminal referral, but they later corrected themselves saying it was non-criminal and "related to the potential compromise of classified information."

Carrie reports that there has been no decision yet from Justice about whether it will launch an investigation into the State Department Clinton email issue based on the referral.

Clinton's use of a private email account was first reported in March by the Times. Before the revelation, Clinton had turned over tens of thousands of emails to the State Department and eventually asked for them to be made public. The State Department is releasing the emails in batches as they are reviewed for sensitive information.

Our friends at It's All Politics took a comprehensive look at the law in April. They found that whether any law was broken would likely come down to whether classified material was sent over Clinton's personal account.

Update at 2:50 p.m. ET. One Or Two Referrals?

There has been some confusion as to how many inspectors general have issued referrals to the Department of Justice.

The New York Times originally said both the inspector general for the State Department and the one for the Intelligence Community referred the issue to Justice.

But Rep. Elijah Cummings and State Department spokesman Mark Toner said that was incorrect. The Intelligence Community inspector general did confirm that it had referred the case to Justice and Justice also confirmed receiving a referral.

We have updated this post to reflect this new information.

Update at 11:16 a.m. ET. Rep. Cummings Rebuts Reports:

Rep. Elijah Cummings, a Democrat from Maryland, tells The Hill that the State Department inspector general has told him that he did not request a criminal investigation.

The Hill reports:

"'I spoke personally to the State Department Inspector General on Thursday, and he said he never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage,' Cummings, the top Democrat on the House Select Committee on Benghazi, said Friday in a statement.

"Instead, Steve Linick, State's Inspector General 'told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the [Freedom of Information Act] review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified.'"

Update at 11:03 a.m. ET. The Public Release Of Classified Info:

In a memo dated June 29, Steve Linick, the State Department's inspector general, writes that there was concern that a batch of emails scheduled for release the next day contained "possible classified material."

Another later memo says at least one of those emails containing classified information has been released to the public.

Update at 9:57 a.m. ET. The Memos:

The State Department's Office of the Inspector General has now made the memos the New York Times reported on public. We've uploaded them here. But here is the key paragraph from a July 17, 2015, memo written by Steve Linick, the State Department's inspector general:

How The New York Times Bungled the Hillary Clinton Emails Story // Newsweek // Kurt Eichenwald - July 24, 2015

What the hell is happening at The New York Times?

In March, the newspaper published a highly touted article about Hillary Clinton's use of a personal email account that, as I wrote in an earlier column, was wrong in its major points. The Times's public editor defended that piece, linking to a lengthy series of regulations that, in fact, proved the allegations contained in the article were false. While there has since been a lot of partisan hullaballoo about "email-bogus-gate"—something to be expected when the story involves a political party's presidential front-runner—the reality remained that, when it came to this story, there was no there there.

Then, on Thursday night, the Times dropped a bombshell: Two government inspectors general had made a criminal referral to the Justice Department about Clinton and her handling of the emails. The story was largely impenetrable, because at no point did it offer even a suggestion of what might constitute a crime. By Friday morning, the Times did what is known in the media trade as a "skin back"—the article now said the criminal referral wasn't about Clinton but about the department's handling of emails. Still, it conveyed no indication of what possible crime might be involved.

The story seemed to further fall apart on Friday morning when Representative Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) issued a statement saying that he had spoken to the inspector general of the State Department and that there had been no criminal referral regarding Clinton's email usage. Rather, Cummings said, the inspectors general for State and the intelligence community had simply notified the Justice Department—which issues the regulations on Freedom of Information Act requests—that some emails subject to FOIA review had been identified as classified when they had not previously been designated that way.

So had the Times mixed up a criminal referral—a major news event—with a notification to the department responsible for overseeing FOIA errors that might affect some documents' release? It's impossible to tell, because the Times story—complete with its lack of identification of any possible criminal activity—continues to mention a criminal referral.

But based on a review of documents from the inspectors general, the problems with the story may be worse than that—much, much worse. The reason my last sentence says may is this: There is a possibility—however unlikely—that the Times cited documents in its article that have the same dates and the same quotes but are different from the records I have reviewed. I emailed Dean Baquet, the Times's executive editor, to ask if there are some other records the paper has and a series of other questions, but received no response. (Full disclosure: I'm a former senior writer for the Times and have worked with Baquet in the past.)

So, in an excess of caution, I'm leaving open the possibility that there are other documents with the same quotes on the same dates simply because the other conclusion—that The New York Times is writing about records its reporters haven't read or almost willfully didn't understand—is, for a journalist, simply too horrible to contemplate.

Indeed, if the Times article is based on the same documents I read, then the piece is wrong in all of its implications and in almost every particular related to the inspector generals' conclusions. These are errors that go far beyond whether there was a criminal referral of Clinton's emails or a criminal referral at all. Sources can mislead; documents do not.

First, what did the Times article say? To be charitable, let's use the skinned-back version and quote the first two paragraphs:

Two inspectors general have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account Hillary Rodham Clinton used as secretary of state, senior government officials said Thursday.

The request follows an assessment in a June 29 memo by the inspectors general for the State Department and the intelligence agencies that Mrs. Clinton's private account contained "hundreds of potentially classified emails." The memo was written to Patrick F. Kennedy, the under secretary of state for management.

The words in those paragraphs would lead any rational reader of the Times story to conclude that sensitive government information was mishandled, that this mishandling raised concerns about criminal activity, and that these concerns related somehow to classified information in Clinton's email account.

Here are the words that were left out: Freedom of Information Act. At no point in the story does the Times mention what this memo—and the other it cited—was really all about: that the officials at the Freedom of Information office in the State Department and intelligence agencies, which were reviewing emails for release, had discovered emails that may not have been designated with the correct classification. For anyone who has dealt with the FOIA and government agencies, this is something that happens all the time in every administration. (Advice to other journalists: That is why it's smart to file multiple FOIA requests for the same document; different FOIA officials will declare different items unreleasable, so some records can be turned over where a sentence has been blacked out because one reviewer decided it was classified, while another deemed it unclassified.)

The problem is, it is not as if the real purpose of this memo was hard to discern. Here is the subject heading: "Potential Issues Identified by the Office of the Inspector General of the Intelligence Community Concerning the Department of State's Process for the Review of Former Secretary Clinton's Emails under the Freedom of Information Act (ESP-15-05)"

Get it? This is about the process being used by FOIA officials in reviewing former Secretary Clinton. And former government officials have nothing to do with how FOIA officials deal with requests for documentation. To jump from this fact to a conclusion that, somehow, someone thinks there is a criminal case against Clinton (the original story) requires a level of recklessness that borders on, well, criminal behavior.

Yes, there is memo after memo after memo, which the Times gloats were given to it by a senior government official. (For those who have thoughts of late-night meetings in parking garages or the Pentagon Papers, they were unclassified documents. Reporters obtain those kinds of records through the complex, investigative procedure of asking the press office for them.) And all of them are about the exact same thing: the process being used by current FOIA officials reviewing the emails of a former official is messed up. That's like criticizing the former owner of a car for the work conducted by the new owner's mechanic.

So what was the point of the Kennedy memo actually written by the two inspector generals (the State Department's Steve Linick and the intelligence community's Charles McCullough III)? The memo itself is very clear: "The Department should ensure that no classified documents are publically released."

In terms of journalism, this is terrible. That the Times article never discloses this is about an after-the-fact review of Clinton's emails conducted long after she left the State Department is simply inexcusable. That this all comes from a concern about the accidental release of classified information—a fact that goes unmentioned—is even worse. In other words, the Times has twisted and turned in a way that makes this story seem like something it most decidedly is not. This is no Clinton scandal. It is no scandal at all. It is about current bureaucratic processes, probably the biggest snooze-fest in all of journalism.

The heavy breathing of deception or incompetence by the Times doesn't stop there. In fact, almost every paragraph at the top of the story is wrong, misleading or fundamentally deceptive.

The third paragraph states: "It is not clear if any of the information in the emails was marked as classified by the State Department when Mrs. Clinton sent or received them." No, in fact, it is quite clear. All of the memos are about emails that the officials say may not have been properly designated as classified, meaning it would be improper to release them. If a document is marked as classified, it is certainly not difficult to determine if it has been marked as classified. Paragraph three is false.

Paragraph four: "But since her use of a private email account for official State Department business was revealed in March, she has repeatedly said that she had no classified information on the account." Mmmm-kay. A point that would seem to be reinforced by the fact that this whole issue is about whether emails should have been designated as classified by FOIA officials. The but makes it seem as if there is a contradiction, when in fact the two points are completely consistent.

Then there are a couple of paragraphs that are a short summary of the past and a comment from the Clinton campaign saying any released emails deemed classified were designated that way after the fact. Yah—that's what the memos are talking about.

All of this is bad enough, but then there is the ultimate disaster, paragraph seven: "At issue are thousands of pages of State Department emails from Mrs. Clinton's private account. Mrs. Clinton has said she used the account because it was more convenient, but it also shielded her correspondence from congressional and Freedom of Information Act requests."

Wow. The first time that the story—which readers cannot possibly know is about FOIA requests—finally mentions FOIA requests, it just manufactures a reality out of thin air. Using a private account would not, in any way, shield Clinton's correspondence from congressional or FOIA requests.

Start with the rules. Under the FOIA, any document that is not specifically exempted and that falls "under the control of the Department" at the time the request for those records is submitted must be produced. By legal definition, the secretary of state qualifies as part of "the Department," and thus anything that official writes as part of the job—whether by email, telegraph or handwritten on personal stationery—is subject to a FOIA request. Same goes for Congress. That's why congressional hearings sometimes produce personal handwritten documents—the fact that they might not be in an email server does not limit the requirement that they be turned over.

Second, contrary to the implication from the first Times story, Clinton's emails sent in her role as secretary of state were automatically saved into a secure data system under the control of the department. In fact, where does the Times think the FOIA offices for the State Department and the intelligence community are finding the 55,000 emails now under review that it cites in its new story? Are officials breaking into Clinton's house in the middle of the night to examine them by flashlight? Nope. They are pulling them off of the system under the department's control.

Then there is accusation by false association. If a sentence read, "Bill shot Ted, and Ted died," any responsible journalist who wrote that would understand the implication was that Bill killed Ted. But if the truth is that Bill accidentally shot Ted when they were on a hunting trip, and 30 years later Ted died from heart disease, the implied accusation is true in its fact yet false in its statement.

This unforgivable journalistic sin turns up in paragraphs 13 and 14 in the Times story. They read:

The inspectors general also criticized the State Department for its handling of sensitive information, particularly its reliance on retired senior Foreign Service officers to decide if information should be classified, and for not consulting with the intelligence agencies about its determinations.

In March, Mrs. Clinton insisted that she was careful in her handling of information on her private account. "I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email," she said.

No reader could possibly know that the two paragraphs, jammed together and using similar phrases—handling of information and handling of sensitive information—have nothing to do with each other. The first paragraph is once again based on the inspectors general's memos. And again, what those memos are actually discussing is the way that the FOIA office is handling its review of the former secretary of state's emails for public release. They in no way discuss Clinton, her handling of emails or anything approaching those topics.

But by slapping those two paragraphs together and using the same words, the Times—again, either out of recklessness, ignorance or intentional deception—makes it seem as if the inspectors general are saying Clinton mishandled classified information. They didn't.

In our hyper-partisan world, many people will not care about the truth here. That the Times story is false in almost every particular—down to the level of who wrote what memo—will only lead to accusations that people trying to set the record straight are pro-Hillary. I am not pro-Hillary. I am, however, pro-journalism. And this display of incompetence or malice cannot stand without correction.

And to other reporters: Democracy is not a game. It is not a means of getting our names on the front page or setting the world abuzz about our latest scoop. It is about providing information so that an electorate can make decisions based on reality. It is about being fair and being accurate. This despicable Times story was neither.

What Hillary Can Learn From Amy Schumer // Daily Beast // Keli Goff - July 24, 2015

The confident, approachable, and self-deprecating Schumer could be a better model for Hillary than you'd think.

In her new interview with GQ magazine, Amy Schumer said that she's a fan of presidential candidate Hillary Clinton. She also shared that the feeling is mutual, noting that at the Glamour Women of the Year Awards Clinton told Schumer she related to one of Schumer's jokes. The joke in question? "I said that in L.A. my arms register as legs, and she really liked that. She was like, 'I can relate,'" Schumer recalled.

But Schumer and Clinton actually have more in common than their sense of humor about the absurd physical expectations society places on women, particularly women in their chosen professions. For starters, they are both feminists whose political leanings have guided their work. But it is the differences in their approaches—and how they are perceived by the public—that may tell us more about Hillary's chances for winning the White House in 2016 than yet another poll. (Although we will get to the latest polls in a second.)

When people think of Hillary Clinton, a lot of words come to mind. Polarizing is one of them. But even her detractors will acknowledge she's also smart, resilient, and tough. They've thrown the kitchen sink at her over the years and she's still standing.

However, even her admirers would acknowledge she's not what voters would call accessible. There's always a bit of a wall there. (Having that kitchen sink thrown at her may have something to do with that.) And even more damaging is the perception that she is not authentic. A growing number of voters find her dishonest, according to the latest Quinnipiac poll.

Schumerhas been incredibly blunt about how trying it can be to be a woman in a man's world, but men are too busy laughing with her to resent her for calling out the patriarchy.

Smart + inaccessible + inauthentic does not usually equal someone who can easily win a presidential race. Just look at Al Gore and Mitt Romney.

Add to that equation the fact that she's a woman and the climb is even tougher because, as unfair as it is, we all know women are judged by different standards. It is never enough to just be smart or talented or tough; we're also supposed to be attractive and likable at the same time. (Before anyone starts typing an angry tweet or comment dismissing the notion that women candidates are judged differently, ask yourself honestly what would happen if a female candidate stopped wearing makeup on the campaign trail and wore the same suit every day, something Clinton recently touched upon.)

This is what makes Schumer's ascent both fascinating and potentially instructive for Clinton, someone who Schumer has said she plans to campaign for.

Standup comedy is not exactly known for being an easy place for women and very few female standup comics have truly cracked the boys club to become household names. Even fewer have managed to earn serious respect within the uber-male, uber-macho comic community. But Schumer's done it. She's managed to become a breakout star with as many male fans as female ones, and she's done it without compromising her feminist zeal. There wasn't a doubt in my mind Schumer was both smart and a feminist the first time I read one of her jokes. But I also realized the reason she would be a huge success is because:

A) Even her comments about feminist issues, like women's body image, were ones men could laugh at.

B) Even when a joke didn't really land, you could tell Schumer told it because she thought it was funny—not because she spent hours calculating where that joke would land her career-wise.

C) She would tell you the truth about how she saw things—even if it were supremely uncomfortable for all involved, including her, the subject, or the audience.

D) You can genuinely tell she has a sense of humor about it all—including some of the unfair nonsense she knows she will have to put up with that a male comedian won't.

Part of Clinton's problem is that she struggles with all of the above. Having met her more than once I know she has a great laugh—but I doubt many Americans believe she has a great sense of humor, and that comes across.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's this sense that the weariness of the last two decades on the national stage has robbed her of her sense of enthusiasm for the process altogether, and possibly stoked a resentment for it. I can't say I blame her. Unlike Hillary, I have a tough time hiding my disdain for stupidity, prying questions, and people I don't like. These are among the many reasons I would never run for office.

But Clinton is running, so that means she's going to have to find a way to see the humor in it all. From the stupid comments some commentator (likely male) will probably make about her appearance down the road, to the stupid question someone will ask her in a debate that he would never ask a man. Schumer has been incredibly blunt about how trying it can be to be a woman in a man's world, but men are too busy laughing with her to resent her for calling out the patriarchy.

A big part of Schumer's effectiveness is that whatever she says, it's clear she says it because she either really believes it or really believes it is funny. Consider this: When Schumer faced her first round of negative publicity, specifically the criticism she faced for making racially insensitive jokes in the past, she did what few are willing to do in the age of Twitter outrage: she defended herself. That further enraged some people, but it also impressed others, me being one of them.

Though she eventually came around to saying she had evolved past the jokes in question, whether you liked them or not, they reinforced a fundamental perception about her: If she thinks it's funny she'll say it out loud. You may not always love a person like that, but you also know you can trust her.

This week a thirty-something, white, female pro-choice friend mentioned to me she finds Clinton untrustworthy. She doesn't dislike her. But just doesn't trust her. When I pressed her on why, she mentioned the private email server, but fundamentally it wasn't about that. You either believe someone will tell you the truth, and show you who they really are, or you don't.

In her GQ interview Schumer said, "I love being in my own skin" and professed she wants others to feel comfortable in theirs.

For Clinton to win the presidency she's going to have to show Americans that she's not only smart, resilient, and tough, but comfortable in her own skin.

Hillary Clinton wants to take on "quarterly capitalism" — here's what that means // Vox // Matthew Yglesias - July 24, 2015

In a speech today at NYU's Stern Business School, Hillary Clinton plans to finger what she considers a key impediment to long-term economic growth: "quarterly capitalism." It's a brand of excessively short-term thinking in which Wall Street considerations end up doing too much to drive Main Street business decisions.

It's an intriguing way to drive a conceptually left-wing message that many business executives actually agree with, and a demonstration that there's no necessary tension between a progressive economic approach focused on fairness and a more centrist one focused on growth.

It also reveals the deeply wonky side of Clinton. The supporting policy details that her campaign has hinted at thus far — a change to the tax code's definition of long-term capital gains, a new approach to sharing buyback transparency, and perhaps some limits on the things so-called "activist" investors are allowed to do — are not exactly candy for the masses. They're an effort to grapple with some deep and profound issues about the nature of the American economic system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What is "quarterly capitalism"?

The term comes from McKinsey & Company managing director Dominic Barton and some ideas he laid out in a March 2011 Harvard Business Review article, but the basic concept is much older. It stems from the ritual through which publicly traded companies release a statement about revenue and spending every three months, known as the quarterly earning report.

These statements can have very large influences on share prices. For example, on the afternoon of July 23 Amazon released an earnings report that performed well above the consensus expectations of Wall Street analysts. That caused its shares to skyrocket in value — up 18 percent — within a matter of hours. And yet while the report was certainly good news for Amazon, it — like most quarterly earnings reports — didn't really tell us much of anything about the most profound issues facing Amazon (or any other company) in the long run.

The thesis of quarterly capitalism is that the link between short-term earnings and share prices, and the link between share prices and CEO pay, has created management practices that are excessively focused on living month to month.

"Lost in the frenzy," wrote Barton, "is the notion that long-term thinking is essential for long-term success."

How quarterly capitalism can hurt America

On some level, the idea that giant businesses — just like everyone else — sometimes have trouble focusing on the long term sounds like a bit of a platitude. But there's reason to believe that short-termism in corporate America can hurt the country's long-term economic prospects.

To see why, consider two companies deeply enmeshed in the technology industry and the mobile revolution — Google and Verizon.

One big difference between these companies is that Google's voting stock is utterly dominated by its two founders, Larry Page and Sergei Brin, who can steer the company in any which way they like. Verizon, by contrast, was essentially founded by nobody. It's a corporate descendant of Bell Atlantic, which was founded in 1983 after the government made AT&T break up. AT&T itself was founded way back in 1885. All of which is to say that Verizon is highly subject to the whims of the stock market, while Google essentially reflects the vision of two entrepreneurs.

Consequently, the companies behave very differently.

Google is adventurous: It plows the profits from its web search into a shockingly wide range of ventures. It launched an email service and a calendar and an office productivity suite. It builds a free mobile operating system. But it also builds Chrome OS for laptops. It made some weird glasses. It is trying to build a self-driving car. It runs fiber-optic networks in eight cities.

Verizon pays a lot of dividends: By contrast, Verizon does not really do exciting things. It does invest money in its infrastructure. But it does so relatively cautiously, rolling out new fiber-optic lines at a measured pace. It could build fiber faster, but doing so would be expensive. Instead Verizon prefers to spend about $8 billion a year on paying dividends to its shareholders, with billions on top of that spent on buying Verizon stock.

Verizon acts this way in large part because that's how Wall Street wants it to act. Spending billions on dividends and buybacks is better for the share price than spending billions on new infrastructure to compete with Comcast,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

AT&T, and others.

But it certainly seems like it would be better for America if telecommunications companies were investing more furiously in improving services and competing with each other.

Research says public companies invest less

Of course, anyone can tell anecdotes. But academic research appears to back up the idea that stock market pressures lead companies to invest less than they otherwise would. John Asker, Joan Farre-Mensa, and Alexander Ljungqvist did a study in which they compared publicly traded companies to otherwise similar companies that are privately owned. They found that "compared to private firms, public firms invest substantially less and are less responsive to changes in investment opportunities" and that this happens "especially in industries in which stock prices are most sensitive to earnings news."

Short-termism, in other words, leads to less investment.

A clever synthesis

As my colleague Jon Allen has written, Hillary Clinton is a fairly unimpressive public speaker on the stump, but she's an extremely skilled consensus builder and savvy candidate. The quarterly capitalism thesis is an example of that. On the one hand, it's a potent critique of mainstream financial capitalism as practiced in the United States and similar countries. It resonates deeply with the concerns of the American labor movement, and with critics of Wall Street's influence on the real economy. It reflects an academic research agenda that arose on the leftward margins of the debate and has gained in influence over the years.

At the same time, framing a campaign argument around a Harvard Business Review article by a McKinsey managing director is hardly a call for imminent revolution and the overthrow of capitalism.

In fact, this is a criticism that lots of CEOs and other rich businessmen agree with. They wish they were less slave to quarterly earnings reports and had more of the freedom of a Larry Page. These are left-wing themes, in other words, but while they'll certainly make Clinton some enemies among the activist investor class they don't do all that much to alienate donors or position her as anti-business.

Things will get harder the deeper she delves into policy specifics, but as a broad campaign theme it's a tour de force. By embracing the quarterly capitalism critique, Clinton offers a more radical criticism of the status quo than we've ever heard from Barack Obama while also showing herself to be more sensitive to the concrete concerns of American executives.

Hillary Clinton's capital gains tax reform, explained // Vox // Matthew Yglesias - July 24, 2015

As part of her plan to reduce the impact of short-term thinking on corporate America, Hillary Clinton is proposing a revamp of how investment income is taxed in America. Right now, the tax code distinguished between a short-term investment held for less than a year and a long-term investment held for longer than that. She wants to replace that with a different system, featuring a six-year sliding scale of rates to give genuinely long-term investors a leg up.

What's a capital gain? How is it taxed?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A capital gain is income that a person makes from investment. If you buy a house for $200,000 and sell it 10 years later for $250,000, you have scored a $50,000 capital gain. The current tax code largely exempts capital gains earned buying and selling owner-occupied houses, so the debate over capital gains taxation generally focuses on capital gains secured by buying and selling stocks, bonds, and other financial assets.

Right now the tax code distinguishes between short-term capital gains and long-term capital gains. A short-term capital gain is defined as a gain on an asset that you owned for less than a year, while a long-term capital gain is defined as a gain on an asset that you owned for longer than a year. Short-term capital gains are taxed at the same rate as wage or salary income, but long-term capital gains are taxed at a lower rate.

In other words, the current tax code already features lower tax rates for income derived from long-term capital gains than for income derived from other sources. Clinton is proposing, essentially, to extend the logic of the current system, not to replace it with a whole new logic.

Why is capital gains income taxed at a lower rate?

There are three big explanations for the current system — a cynical one, one grounded in political rhetoric, and an economics-y one:

The cynical take is that capital gains income receives a tax preference because the vast majority of capital gains income is earned by rich people. And not just any old kind of rich person. A movie star or LeBron James is still mostly working for a living. It takes a classy kind of rich person to have big stock market earnings.

The rhetorical reason typically offered is that, as the American Enterprise Institute's James Pethokoukis says, capital gains taxes are a "double tax." The idea is that first Mr. Richpants gets paid a salary and pays taxes on it. Then he takes some of his after-tax dollars and invests them in the stock market. Then when he sells his stock, he is "taxed again" on his earnings in a way that would not have happened had he spent the money on a boat rather than invested it in the stock market.

The economics-y reason is a result in theoretical macroeconomics stemming from work by Christophe Chamley and Kenneth Judd that shows that under appropriate assumptions, the socially optimal level of investment taxation is zero. The result involves a lot of math, but the intuitive idea is that the less you tax investments in capital goods, the more capital goods you get. And the more capital goods you have, the higher your wages will be. Consequently, even people who derive all their income from wages benefit in the long run from not taxing capital income. Garrett Jones has a slightly longer explanation featuring light math if you are interested.

What is Hillary Clinton proposing to do?

Her campaign has not yet released a fully-fleshed out plan, but they say she wants to make two changes. One is to push the current one-year definition of short-term capital gains out to two-years.

The second is that she doesn't want to give every investment held for longer than two years equal treatment. Instead, she wants a sliding scale of rates over a multi-year period so that you would need to hold an investment for a full six years to qualify for the discount rate.

Is the case for low capital taxation correct?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Needless to say, people disagree. In practice, there appears to be very strong political consensus around preferential treatment for investment income. Even very liberal members of Congress, for example, do not propose ending the exemption of capital gains income from the payroll tax that finances Social Security. Nor do liberal members of Congress propose to end the exemption of profits made by selling owner-occupied homes from capital gains taxation. Countries all around the world feature some form of preferential treatment of investment income, and despite the partisan controversies around the capital gains tax rate nobody in American politics is actually proposing to do away entirely with our own preferential treatment.

That said, as is typical with highly theoretical results in macroeconomics, there are massive challenges in saying whether the Chamley-Judd construct applies in a meaningful way to the actual policy choice at hand. As economist Matthew Martin writes, "Any graduate macro text will show you some of the ways in which Chamley-Judd assumptions are violated in reality, producing a non-zero optimal tax rate."

Empirical studies also struggle to confirm the idea that tax rates on investment income are an important driver of real investment activity. A recent, statistically sophisticated study of the 2003 dividend tax cut by Danny Yagan, for example, finds that "the tax cut caused zero change in corporate investment."

Note, however, that even if the optimal tax rate for capital gains isn't zero it might still be optimal to have a lower rate on investment income than on wage income.

Why is Hillary Clinton proposing this?

Rather typically for Clinton as a political actor, what she seems to be zeroing in on is a clever way to build consensus between competing factions of wonks.

By raising tax rates on medium-term capital gains, Clinton will raise a bunch of tax revenue, and she will raise it overwhelmingly from high-income individuals. These are key demands of liberals, who are hungry for social spending and redistribution.

At the same time, by maintaining the low rate on longer-term capital gains, Clinton avoids a root-and-branch challenge to the principle of a tax preference for investment.

Clinton has been critical lately of what she calls "quarterly capitalism" and the idea that real world investment activity is being excessively influenced by short-term stock market fluctuations and earnings targets. Her altered tax system would make it more lucrative to be a patient investor than an impatient one, which might help generate an overall more patient climate on Wall Street — boosting corporate investment and fostering more long-term thinking.

A serious venture capitalist, for example, would almost certainly find himself still qualifying for the preferential rate. But a corporate raider looking to buy a company, strip assets, improve quarterly results, and then exit as quickly as possible would not.

Expect the campaign to front-load this short-term versus long-term issue, since it's emerging as a key theme for Clinton overall. But also note that in theory one could accomplish the same thing with a tax cut. Take today's rate for investments held over one year and apply it to investments held for one to three years. Take longer-term investments and apply a new lower rate to them. This would address the short-termism concern, while also addressing the GOP's opposition to higher taxes.

Clinton won't offer a proposal along those lines because for her, tax revenue and tax system progressivity are at least as important as the short-term versus long-term issue.

How the old rules apply to the new Hillary Clinton email scoop // Vox // Jonathan Allen - July 24, 2015

Two federal inspectors general want the Justice Department to investigate whether classified information was mishandled in relation to then–Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's now-famous emails. There are two parts to the story that are worth noting.

First, the ongoing probes of Clinton and her email are at the very least a political problem that's not going away anytime soon. She'll have the unique challenge of running for president while being investigated by Congress, and perhaps at some point by the Justice Department. The Obama administration is in the uncomfortable position of either investigating the prohibitive favorite for the Democratic nomination or taking hits for stonewalling on her behalf. Some of the reporting Friday morning suggests that Secretary of State John Kerry, who isn't a big Clinton fan, is getting tired of his agency looking bad. As the Wall Street Journal reported, the investigators' memo revealed "hundreds of potentially classified emails within the collection" and that there may be classified material in one of the emails the department already has made public.

Second, the Clinton rules are in full effect again. This case would fall under the umbrella of No. 3: The media assumes that Clinton is acting in bad faith until there's hard evidence otherwise. The New York Times, which got the scoop, rewrote its original story and is taking a beating from political observers and other media outlets for it. The first version said the inspectors general want a criminal investigation into Clinton's actions specifically, while the revised copy says they want the Justice Department to open a probe, more broadly, into whether the email was mishandled. It may turn out that Clinton is responsible for mishandling sensitive material, but the inspectors general didn't ask for an investigation into her, as the first version of the Times story said. Here are the two versions:

The Times also changed the headline of the story, from "Criminal Inquiry Sought in Hillary Clinton’s Use of Email" to "Criminal Inquiry Is Sought in Clinton Email Account," reflecting a similar recasting of Clinton's possible role. The article's URL was also changed to reflect the new headline.

If Clinton was sending classified email from her personal account, attached to a personal server, that's a political problem — and possibly a legal one — that will be difficult to mitigate. She has said she wasn't sending and receiving classified information, but there's a catch to that — since her email was on her personal server, there was no way for anyone to know and mark it classified.

Still, when the media gets the story wrong, it gives Clinton an out in terms of the public relations war.

Clinton responds to reports of possible email investigation // LA Times // Michael Memoli - July 24, 2015

Before delivering a speech about corporate culture on Wall Street, Hillary Rodham Clinton on Friday addressed reports that the Justice Department had been asked to investigate whether classified material passed through her private email account during her time as secretary of State.

Clinton suggested the news reports were inaccurate and that "maybe the heat is getting to everybody."

"We all have a responsibly to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails. I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House committee," she said.

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right. And I will do my part. But I'm also going to remain focused on the big issues. Particularly the big issues that really matter to American families.”

Clinton calls on corporations to shift focus to longer-term growth // LA Times // Michael Memoli - July 24, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton called on American business leaders Friday to rethink a focus on short-term stock gains in favor of longer-term growth, outlining proposals she said would address the trend of what she called “quarterly capitalism” that has left the middle class behind.

Speaking in New York, Clinton cited data that showed large publicly held companies returned a record amount of earnings directly to shareholders through dividends and stock buybacks, at the expense of capital expenditures or wage increases for their employees. The kind of focus on tactics to boost short-term profits was “bad for business, bad for wages and bad for our economy, and fixing it will be good for everybody,” she said.

At the start of her speech, Clinton took a moment to address the reports that government inspectors general had asked the Justice Department to investigate into whether classified information was mishandled through the private email account Clinton used as secretary of State. Clinton said there “have been a lot of inaccuracies” while noting that she has released 55,000 pages of her emails and was ready to testify before a special congressional panel.

“We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right. And I will do my part,” she said.

The centerpiece of the plan Clinton laid out Friday was a revision to the capital gains tax that would implement a sliding scale, taxing gains from stock sales within two years at the same rate as incomes for those earning more than $465,000 a year, but returning to the current rate of 20% after six years.

She called the capital gains reform an “important first step” to address short-term culture and said it would be part of a larger tax reform plan she will outline. Executive compensation was another area she said should be examined, saying there was “something wrong when senior executives get rich when companies stutter.”

The speech builds off a broader economic policy speech Clinton gave on July 13 in which she called ending wage stagnation the "defining economic issue of our time." Later that week in New Hampshire, she proposed giving short-term tax credits to businesses that create profit-sharing arrangements with their employees.

Though Clinton is the heavy favorite to win her party’s nomination, she faces pressure from an active progressive base and Democratic rivals to embrace more-sweeping economic proposals to address income inequality. Notably in her speech, Clinton welcomed a recent decision by a New York panel to implement a $15-per-hour wage for fast-food workers, while noting that the cost of living in the state was higher than other places. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, an independent running in the Democratic primary, headlined a rally at the Capitol this week calling for a national $15-per-hour minimum wage.

Another Democratic candidate, former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, challenged his opponents to embrace a set of principles guiding additional Wall Street and corporate reforms.

"If Secretary Clinton wants to earn the enthusiastic support of grassroots progressives that means standing up, staking out genuinely bold positions on income inequality, and aggressively taking on the powerful, greed-driven institutions that have dominated the Democratic Party and held back the prosperity of the American people for far too long," Charles Chamberlain, executive director of Democracy for America, said in a statement. "Today's speech hits those notes in some ways, but fails to do so in others."

Clinton promised that additional proposals focused on "reining in excessive risk on Wall Street" would be forthcoming but focused on answering Friday what she said was the important question of how to define shareholder value.

"I understand that most CEOs are simply responding to very real pressures from shareholders and the market to turn in good quarterly numbers. And investors are always looking for strong, reliable returns. But it is clear that the system is out of balance," she said.

Federal investigators want Justice Department probe of Hillary Clinton emails // LA Times // Evan Halper - July 24, 2015

The Department of Justice has been asked to open an investigation into the use of a personal email account by Hillary Rodham Clinton while she was secretary of State, after government investigators concluded that classified information may have been mishandled, U.S. officials said.

Inspectors general for the State Department and intelligence agencies asked that the investigation be opened after finding that Clinton's private account potentially contained hundreds of classified emails. The New York Times first reported the request to the Justice Department.

"The department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information," said its statement. "It is not a criminal referral." Officials at the Justice Department declined to say anything further about it.

Such referrals are routine when investigators in the office of the inspector general for the intelligence community find evidence that classified information may have been sent using unsecured email. In this case, the evidence was referred to the FBI counterintelligence division, according to a U.S. official briefed on the review.

The official cautioned that the referral was an early step and far from any possible prosecution.

The Justice Department's clarification, though, only raised a fresh round of questions. Regardless of whether criminal charges are involved, the compromise of classified information is generally considered a serious breach.

Clinton has said repeatedly she did not keep classified information on the account. Her campaign said in a statement that the emails in question were classified by the State Department retroactively, and thus Clinton violated no laws. It is unclear from the published findings of the inspectors general whether they found otherwise.

"We all have a responsibility to get this right," Clinton said in brief remarks addressing the issue Friday during a speech on the economy. "I have released 55,000 pages of emails; I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions."

Congressional Democrats released a letter Friday from the intelligence agencies' inspector general that they said demonstrates that none of the material Clinton handled was marked classified. The memo said the investigators found no emails with “classification or dissemination markings” among the batch reviewed.

But the inspector general, I. Charles McCullough, also noted there were emails Clinton turned over to the State Department that did, indeed, contain classified information but were not marked as such.

“We note that none of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings, but some included … classified information and should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked and transmitted via a secure network,” the letter said.

The finding reflects new concerns about the way Clinton managed her email. Even if she took care not to accept or send messages marked as classified through her personal server, sensitive material does not always get appropriately marked immediately. McCullough reviewed a sampling of 40 of the 30,000 emails from the Clinton server and found four of them had information that should have been marked and handled as classified.

McCullough’s note also points out that Clinton’s attorney, David Kendall, still appears to have those emails on an unclassified system. “The 30,000 emails in question are purported to have been copied to a thumb drive in the possession of former Secretary Clinton’s personal counsel,” the letter said.

The development is likely to prove a considerable problem for the Clinton campaign. The former secretary of State’s email practices have been a constant point of attack for opponents and have fueled the perception among voters that Clinton is untrustworthy.

A House committee investigating Clinton’s handling of the terrorist attacks in Benghazi, Libya, in 2012 that claimed American lives has focused its investigation on her personal email account. Its Republican chair has repeatedly accused Clinton of working to conceal information that could shed more light on how the State Department handled the attacks.

The State Department is under a court order to quickly review the 55,000 pages of emails that Clinton sent on the private account and release the pages that are unclassified. Some 3,000 pages were disclosed a few weeks ago, and the department is planning to publish another batch by the end of this month.

The day before the most recent release, the two inspectors general sent a memo to the State Department noting that staff reviewing the Clinton emails “report discovering hundreds of potentially classified emails within the collection. In addition, there is concern that possible classified material will be posted in tomorrow’s release.”

The inspectors general later found that one of the emails released to the public contained classified information. Their memo does not pinpoint which email it was.

“At least one of these emails has been released to the public and can be accessed on the Department’s website,” said a July 17 memo written by Patrick Kennedy, the undersecretary for management at State.

Republicans are pressuring the Department of Justice to proceed with an investigation.

“Hillary Clinton’s desire to play by her own rules may have further exposed classified information,” said a statement from Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus. “A full investigation by the Justice Department is not just needed, but required.”

Inspector General Says Hillary Clinton Emails Contained Classified Information // TIME // Zeke J. Miller - July 24, 2015

Federal officials have requested an investigation into a potential compromise of classified information related to the handling of documents once stored on former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's private email server, government officials confirmed Friday.

Clinton and her current and former aides have not been named as targets of the investigation, and the scope of the investigation request has not been revealed.

A Department of Justice official confirmed to TIME Friday morning that there had been a "criminal referral." Later that same day, the official sent an updated statement: "The Department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information. It is not a criminal referral," it read.

Even if Clinton is not targeted in the probe, a Justice Department inquiry could be used to tar her presidential campaign. Her decision to use a private account for government business, and then choosing to delete ostensibly personal information from the server has already contributed to a decline in Clinton's favorability rating and has provoked questions about her trustworthiness.

I. Charles McCullough III, the inspector general for the intelligence community, voiced concerns in a July 23 memo over information that passed through Clinton's email server, was later given to her personal lawyer and returned to the State Department. McCullough said the data should have been treated with greater sensitivity, since it was derived from classified information produced by the U.S. intelligence community.

Clinton has repeatedly said she never allowed information that was marked classified to pass across her private email. "There have been a lot of inaccuracies," she said on Friday of the latest reports. "Maybe the heat is getting to everybody. We all have a responsibility to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails, I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House Committee. We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part."

None of the investigating bodies, in Congress or elsewhere, have accused Clinton of wrongdoing. But questions have been raised about the judgement of State Department officials. "We note that none of the emails we reviewed had classification or dissemination markings, but some included [intelligence community]-derived classified information and should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked, and transmitted via a secure network," wrote McCullough, the inspector general for the intelligence community, who described his review as incomplete.

A spokeswoman for McCullough, Andrea Williams, said Friday that there are at least four emails of concern, which have yet to be released by the State Department under the Freedom of Information Act. "They were not marked at all but contained classified information," she wrote in an email to TIME Friday.

If documents had not initially been marked as classified, agency heads generally have significant legal leeway to decide how to classify most information, with the exception of some categories, like nuclear secrets, which are deemed classified by statute.

"The thing to understand about the classification system is that it is an administrative decision that is rooted in executive order," said Steven Aftergood, a government secrecy expert at the Federation of American Sciences. "The president delegates authority to agency heads. It's up to an agency head to decide if something is properly classified or not."

The request for an investigation, first reported by the New York Times, is in reference to “hundreds of potentially classified emails” contained among Clinton’s messages.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, the ranking Democrat on the House committee investigating Benghazi, denied Friday that there was any criminal referral. “I spoke personally to the State Department inspector general on Thursday, and he said he never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton’s email usage,” Cummings wrote in a statement. “This is the latest example in a series of inaccurate leaks to generate false front-page headlines – only to be corrected later – and they have absolutely nothing to do with the attacks in Benghazi or protecting our diplomatic corps overseas.”

In May, when releasing the first batch of Clinton emails to the public, the State Department, at the request of the intelligence community, classified 23 words of an email relating to the arrest of a suspected assailant in the 2012 Benghazi attack which killed four Americans.

A senior State Department official told TIME then that the retroactive classification does not mean Clinton did anything improper, adding “this happens several times a month” when Freedom of Information Act reports are prepared for the public. The executive order under which the classification program operates allows for the reclassification of information, either because of initial misclassification or because subsequent events have made the information more sensitive.

At the time, the State Department said, the email was unclassified while it resided on Clinton’s server and when it was sent to the House Select Committee on Benghazi. McCullough, the inspector general, told Congress that he believes copies of the emails were also placed on a thumb drive that was given to David Kendall, Clinton’s personal attorney at Williams and Connelly.

In a statement, Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill brushed back on the assertion that Clinton had done anything wrong, noting that the New York Times had also changed the language of its initial story. At first, the Times described “a criminal investigation into whether Hillary Rodham Clinton mishandled sensitive government information.” That was changed to “a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account Hillary Rodham Clinton.”

“Contrary to the initial story, which has already been significantly revised, she followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials,” Merrill said. “As has been reported on multiple occasions, any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted.”

In a March news conference, Clinton denied that she used the unsecured account for classified information. “I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email,” she said. “There is no classified material. So I’m certainly well aware of the classification requirements and did not send classified material.”

In a statement Friday, Speaker of the House John Boehner criticized Clinton for “mishandling” classified email, though it is not yet clear whether that claim is a part of the potential Justice Department probe. He encouraged Clinton to turn over her private server to Congress for further investigation.

“Secretary Clinton has repeatedly claimed that the work-related emails on her private home server did not include classified information, but we know that is not true,” Boehner said. “She has claimed she is well-aware of what matters are classified and what are not, and yet she set up a personal email server to discuss matters of national security despite guidance to the contrary from both her State Department and the White House. Her poor [judgment] has undermined our national security and it is time for her to finally do the right thing.”

The State Department is in the midst of a review of 55,000 pages of emails from Clinton’s server, and is under court order to produce them regularly to the public in order to comply with overdue Freedom of Information Act requests.

The inspectors general of both the State Department and the intelligence community have asked the State Department to review the Clinton emails in a more highly classified environment, “given it is more likely than not” that such records exist in her messages. The department has declined, citing resource constraints.

In her public comments on the server issue, Clinton has at times been less than forthright, telling CNN earlier this month that she hadn’t received a subpoena for the records, for instance, when she had.

“The truth is everything I did was permitted and I went above and beyond what anybody could have expected in making sure that if the State Department didn’t capture something, I made a real effort to get it to them,” Clinton told CNN this month. But Clinton was under a legal obligation to preserve all messages pertaining to her work and to hand them over to the State Department.

Officials: Classified Emails ‘Should Never’ Have Been On Hillary Clinton Server // TIME // Zeke J. Miller - July 24, 2015

"Security referral" triggered by potential copies of classified documents on Clinton's home server, lawyer's thumb drive drive.

The Justice Department investigation into the potential mishandling of classified information was triggered by the revelation that classified information contained in Hillary Clinton’s private email account could still exist on her private home server and on the thumb drive in the control of her personal lawyer, U.S. officials confirmed Friday.

The referral was made by the Intelligence Community’s Inspector General (IC IG) to the Federal Bureau of Investigation’s counterintelligence division, not career prosecutors at the Justice Department. “The IC IG did not make a criminal referral,” said the Inspectors General for the State Department and Intelligence Community in a joint statement Friday. “It was a security referral made for counterintelligence purposes.”

The immediate concerns are four emails culled from a limited sample of 400 emails that contained previously unlabeled classified information. “These emails were not retroactively classified by the State Department; rather these emails contained classified information when they were generated and, according to IC classification officials, that information remains classified today,” their statement said. “This classified information should never have been transmitted via an unclassified personal system.”

In response to a records request from the State Department, Clinton has turned over approximately 30,000 work emails that she had stored on her private email server since her time as Secretary of State. She has previously said that those emails contained no classified information. The four emails in question were not properly labeled as classified, according to the inspectors general.

Both inspectors general say they were required to notify the FBI by law once they found that information that should have been marked as classified was found among the former Secretary of State’s emails. Relevant congressional committees were also notified on July 23.

A Department of Justice official confirmed to TIME Friday that, “The Department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information. It is not a criminal referral.”

I. Charles McCullough III, the inspector general for the intelligence community, voiced concerns in a July 23 memo to Congressional lawmakers over the proper handling of information contained in Clinton's email records. He warned there has already been "an inadvertent release of classified national security information" in a recent release of emails under the Freedom of Information Act, a contention disputed by the State Department.

Andrea Williams, a spokeswoman for McCullough, confirmed that the referral was made to the FBI, in accordance with federal guidelines for the the discovery of the potential compromise of classified information.

In a March news conference, Clinton denied that she used the unsecured account for classified information. "I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email," she said. "There is no classified material. So I'm certainly well aware of the classification requirements and did not send classified material."

What Hillary Clinton's New Tax Proposal Would Mean // TIME // Ian Salisbury - July 24, 2015

Here's how the plan would change capital gains tax rates.

On Friday, Democratic Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton spelled out her new plan to raise tax rates on capital gains — the profits people reap when they sell an asset a like stock, parcel of real estate or even a business.

The capital gains tax rate has been a political football for years, not least because rich people tend to own — and sell — the most stuff. Here are a few key things you need know about capital gains tax in general, and Clinton's proposal specifically.

How are capital gains currently taxed?

While the tax rate on capital gains has bounced around a lot over the years, the big tax deal reached in the last hours of 2012 pushed up the top rate on long-term capital gains to 20% — still far lower than the 39.6% top rate on income (although top earners also pay a health-care related 3.8% surtax on investment income). For taxpayers in lower brackets, long-term capital gains tax rates max out at 15% or less.

There is an exclusion for profits of up to $250,000 ($500,000 if you are married) on your primary residence, so many homeowners won't have to worry about a huge tax bill when they move.

That's all for long-term capital gains, by the way. Short-term capital gains — that is, the profit made on stocks or other assets held less than a year — get taxed at the same rate as income.

Why do capital gains get a tax break?

In the relatively recent past, both Democratic (Bill Clinton) and Republican (George W. Bush) presidents have cut the capital gains rate in hopes that doing so would spur the economy. Since the capital gains tax is really a tax on investment, economists hope that lowering the tax will prompt people to invest more of their money rather than spend it.

The idea is that if more people are looking to invest, it should be easier for start-ups or existing companies that want to develop new products to find funding.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's also why short-term gains get taxed as income — because short-term gains benefit people who make their living buying stuff and then quickly reselling, rather than investing for the long term.

So what's the problem?

In addition to spurring investment, a low long-term capital gains rate also spurs inequality. It's not hard to see who the biggest beneficiaries are: people who invest in the stock market or who sell businesses that they own.

The low capital gains rate is one reason America's 400 biggest earners paid a tax rate of less than 17% in 2012, the latest year for which the IRS has released data. There are also questions about whether the low capital gains rate really does boost the economy.

After all, while the economy took off under Bill Clinton, the stock market has also continued to soar since the most recent increase in the long-term gains rate.

What is Hillary Clinton proposing instead?

Hillary Clinton's proposal would require wealthy taxpayers to hold their investments much longer to get the full long-term capital gains tax benefit. Instead of a single long-term gains rate that kicks in after one year, her plan would create a series of rates ranging from 36% to 24% for those who hold investments for at least two years but less than six years.

Clinton says she isn't doing this simply to raise taxes on the rich. Rather it's to discourage short-termism among big investors. That's something even many on Wall Street regard as a problem, even if higher taxes might not be their preferred solution. So it looks like good politics.

Is it a good idea?

That, of course, depends on who you ask. Many progressives would simply like to see capital gains taxed as income.

Yet it's not even clear whether Clinton's proposal could actually change investor behavior — even if it could pass Congress. "My general impression is deep skepticism," Leonard Burman, director of the nonpartisan think tank the Tax Policy Center told Reuters earlier this week. "Frankly, I don't see the logic in trying to encourage people to hold assets for longer than they want to."

Hillary Clinton Courts Both Liberals and Wall Street with Tax Plan // TIME // Sam Frizell - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Friday proposed a significant hike on capital gains taxes for some investors, a plan favored both by progressive economists and some Wall Street investors.

The proposal is intended to combat short-term investing, which Clinton argued diverts capital away from important business expenditures.

"American companies need to break free from the tyranny of quarterly earning reports so they can do what they do best," Clinton said speaking at New York University in Lower Manhattan on Friday. "Real value comes from long term growth, not short term profits."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's capital gains plan calls for a sliding scale of taxes on investments, with some short-term investments taxed at higher rates than they are now.

Currently, top earners pay a tax rate of 39.6% on investments held for less than a year, a rate that matches those earners' income taxes. After holding those investments for a year, the rate for top earners drops to 24%.

But under Clinton's plan, the tax rate for top earners on capital gains would remain at 39.6% in the second year, and then drop at a staggered rate over six years to their current levels. It would amount to nearly doubling capital gains tax rates in the second year.

"The current definition of a long-term holding period—just one year—is woefully inadequate," Clinton said, calling on companies to abandon what she has called "quarterly capitalism" in favor of more farsighted investments in research and development, talent and physical capital.

A six-year sliding scale, Clinton said, would "provide real incentives for long-term investments."

Clinton's plan for a tax hike is aligned with some voices on Wall Street and financial institutions. Larry Fink, the CEO of BlackRock, the largest asset manager in the world, called earlier this year for a plan similar to Clinton's. In a March letter to the executives of the 500 largest companies in the United States, Fink recommended holding the capital gains tax rate at income tax rates for three years—39.6% for the highest earners—and eventually dropping over a period of 10 years.

"We believe that U.S. tax policy, as it stands, incentivizes short-term behavior," Fink said, using language similar to Clinton's speech on Friday. "We believe that government leaders around the world—with a concerted push from both investors and companies—must act to address public policy that fosters long-term behavior."

A number of other major business figures have openly lamented so-called economic short-termism, including Dominic Barton, managing director of McKinsey & Co., Paul Polman, CEO of Unilever and others.

Economists, particularly those on the left, have also criticized the relatively low rate of capital gains tax, arguing it acts an income subsidy for the wealthiest Americans.

The Joint Committee on Taxation, a nonpartisan Congressional committee, found that low rates on capital gains taxes will deliver in 2015 an effective subsidy of $120.3 billion to investors, most of them wealthy: a separate report by the Congressional Budget Office found that 68% of the benefit of low rates on capital gains and dividends go to the top 1% of earners.

Clinton's plan, some economists say, would reduce inequality in the tax code and create incentives for shareholders to hold longer-term investments.

Clinton's proposal "is a way to target an inefficient tax subsidy—a tax subsidy that subsidizes growing inequality—in a way that encourages more long-term planning by investors," said Harry Stein, director of fiscal policy at the Center for American Progress. "I view this as a piece of a larger agenda to encourage more of a long term outlook."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's plan is meant in part to slow activist investors, who tend to buy large amounts of company stock and call for higher dividends, share buybacks and other strategies to boost share prices. Some executives complain that makes it more difficult for companies to invest in long-term employees or facilities, stunting long-term growth.

Republicans have been quick to criticize the plan, pointing out that Clinton said during the 2008 campaign that she would not raise capital gains taxes above 20%, "if I raised it at all." They argue that capital gains taxes harm economic growth by preventing investment.

"Sadly, Hillary is not wise enough to have learned the simple lesson from those decades: reducing the capital gains tax is part of any pro-growth agenda," said Grover Norquist, president of the conservative Americans for Tax Reform.

Leonard Burman, the director of the nonpartisan Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center and the top tax economist during the last two years of President Bill Clinton's administration, said he doubted the plan would significantly change investor behavior.

"I'm sympathetic with her objective, but I don't think her proposal is going to solve it," Burman said. He added that the plan might actually encourage some shareholders to pull investments out of a company earlier than they would otherwise: under the new plan, investors who could sell shares after six months gain no tax benefits by waiting until after a year, and little benefit for waiting more than two.

Hillary Clinton: Capitalism is out of balance, needs a reset // Fortune // Tory Newmyer - July 24, 2015

In the latest in a string of policy speeches, the Democratic front-runner laid out her plan for tackling corporate short-termism

Hillary Clinton wants to hike capital gains taxes as part of her plan to discourage short-term thinking among corporate executives and investors.

The Democratic presidential front-runner laid out her plan to retool the tax treatment of investment earnings on Friday as part of an ongoing series of speeches fleshing out her economic program. She proposed extending from one to two years the period that top earners would need to hang on to an investment before seeing the 39.6% tax rate applied to it start to fall.

And she would lower the rate slowly, over a six year period, down to the 24% rate for longer-term investments — a tweak that she said would help refigure a system that's bent itself out of shape over the last few decades. Capitalism itself, she said, "needs to be reinvented, it needs to be put back into balance."

Her speech, delivered at New York University's Stern School of Business, was the sort of numerate wonk-fest that's come to characterize her early campaign — an effort aimed in part at comparing favorably with the sprawling free-for-all on the Republican side. It also helped advance the argument she aims to make the substantive centerpiece of both her bid and her presidency: Addressing economic inequality is the defining challenge of our time.

The capital gains tax reform was only the first of five major areas she highlighted as requiring action to reverse the trend toward what she calls "quarterly capitalism," the Wall Street-centered, sugar-high approach distracting public companies from investing in innovation, capital, and worker training and wages in favor of stock buybacks and dividends. The others ranged from leashing activist shareholders to further empowering workers, though she couched her proposals to limit any C-suite alarm bells.

To bring what she called “hit-and-run” activist shareholders to heel, Clinton exhorted institutional investors to exert their leverage as a counterweight on management. And she pledged to order a review of regulations on shareholder activism and to push for the same-day disclosure of buybacks already in force in the United Kingdom and Hong Kong.

Clinton also called out excessive compensation packages for executives as part of the problem. “I’m all for rewarding CEOs well when their companies prosper and their employees also share in the rewards,” she said. “But there is something wrong when senior executives get rich while companies stutter and employees struggle.” To address it, Clinton called for regulators to finalize the Dodd-Frank requirement that companies list the ratio of executive to worker pay; she proposed adjusting performance-based tax write-offs for executives to discourage moves designed to juice share prices; and she pitched mandating explanations for how executive pay packages serve the longterm interest of companies.

For good measure, Clinton added that Washington bears some responsibility, as well. She said elected leaders need to contribute by ending the budget brinkmanship that saddles corporate executives with uncertainty.

While the Democrat’s speech presented as a critique of the wages of a Wall Street-focused economy, the proposals that formed its spine are unlikely to ruffle many feathers in the financial services industry. And her frequent, favorable name-drops of corporate heavies checked any impression that she’s lurched into fire-breathing populist territory. She praised the innovative commitment of Google, SpaceX, and, historically, AT&T and Xerox, for example. Clinton singled out GM, Ford, and Chrysler for “putting the memory of the crisis behind them and making new investments in factories and technologies of the future, including advanced batteries.” Trader Joe’s and QuikTrip, she said, are becoming industry models for investing in worker training; Target and Starbucks are leading larger employers toward raising wages for entry-level workers; and Chipotle has earned her favor not just for its burrito bowls but for starting to provide certain benefits to part-time employees.

It’s of a piece with a carefully calibrated message she will tote through the race as she seeks to keep faith with a restive base without alienating big business interests.

New York Times corrects bombshell email-scandal story after Hillary Clinton blasts it // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato - July 24, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Friday lashed out against "inaccuracies" in reports about her use of a private email address during her time as secretary of state, as the Justice Department weighed whether to open an investigation.

"I want to say a word about what is in the news today, and it is because there have been a lot of inaccuracies,” Clinton said during her opening remarks at an event in Manhattan.

"Maybe the heat is getting to everybody. We all have a responsibility to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails. I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House committee. We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right. And I will do my part."

The Justice Department said on Friday it is weighing a request by two government inspectors to look into the possible mishandling of classified information in Clinton's private email account from when she was secretary of state.

The department said it "has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Justice Department official said the "referral" is not a request for a criminal investigation into Clinton's emails, thousands of which she handed over to the State Department after resigning in 2013. The New York Times reported Thursday night that the inspectors general had asked for a criminal investigation. But the Justice Department told Reuters and other outlets that the referral was not of a criminal nature.

Clinton campaign spokesman Brian Fallon tweeted that The Times should correct its story, which was altered overnight without explanation to suggest she personally was not the focus of a criminal referral. The Times did issue a correction Friday afternoon.

"An earlier version of this article and an earlier headline, using information from senior government officials, misstated the nature of the referral to the Justice Department regarding Hillary Clinton’s personal email account while she was secretary of state," the correction read. "The referral addressed the potential compromise of classified information in connection with that personal email account. It did not specifically request an investigation into Mrs. Clinton."

Clinton's use of a private email account for her work as America's top diplomat came to light in March and brought criticism from political opponents that she had sidestepped transparency and record-keeping laws.

Clinton, the front-runner to represent the Democratic Party in the November 2016 presidential election, has repeatedly said she broke no laws or rules by eschewing a standard government email account for her State Department work in favor of her private account. She also said she sent no classified information by email.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said in a statement that she "followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials."

The former first lady said she handed to the State Department last year all the work-related emails she had, amounting to some 55,000 printed pages covering her four-year tenure, although her staff have recently acknowledged there are gaps in the records she retained.

But the inspector general of the intelligence community, in a letter to Congress, said a limited sampling of Clinton's emails in question found at least four that contained classified information and should have been considered secret.

Reports on Friday about a possible investigation into the emails caused confusion.

The Justice Department had also said the inspectors general had requested a criminal investigation into the emails before backtracking and saying that there was a request for a probe but not a criminal one.

Republicans have seized on the email scandal in Congress and on the presidential campaign trail. The Republican National Committee, in a statement Friday, urged the Justice Department to investigate, saying a full investigation was "not just needed, but required."

Broader questions about Clinton's private email server have at times drawn attention away from the Democratic front-runner's presidential campaign. The latest disclosure comes days after polls in three key swing states showed that a majority of voters did not consider her "honest and trustworthy."

She also trailed three strong Republican contenders — former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, and US Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida — in theoretical general-election matchups in those states.

Call for DoJ probe into Clinton emails // FT // Demetri Sevastopulo and Gina Chon - July 24, 2015

The Department of Justice has been asked to investigate a "potential compromise of classified information" surrounding emails that Hillary Clinton, the frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination, sent on her personal email account when she served as US secretary of state.

Inspectors-general at the state department and intelligence agencies called for the DoJ probe after they found evidence of classified information in the private email account that Mrs Clinton used for government business.

Mrs Clinton has come under heavy criticism since revealing in March that she used a personal email address, instead of her official email account, when serving as secretary of state. Her claims that she sent no classified information over the private email have been called into question by the move by the inspectors-general offices.

"Now we learn that Hillary Clinton's desire to play by her own rules may have further exposed classified information," said Reince Priebus, chairman of the Republican National Committee. "While a full investigation by the DoJ is not just needed, but required, Hillary Clinton must also hand her entire secret server over to an independent third party for further review."

While Mrs Clinton has argued that some previous secretaries of state used personal email, she went one step further by setting up a network server in her home. The scandal of the emails — including thousands that she deleted before they could be examined — has weighed on her presidential campaign in recent months, although she remains comfortably ahead of her Democratic rivals in the polls.

"The department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information," said a DoJ official. "It is not a criminal referral."

The official declined to comment further, but the DoJ has not determined whether it will open an investigation. The US government, particularly under the Obama administration, takes the improper handling of classified information as a serious issue.

Many DoJ prosecutions involving the mishandling of classified information have involved leaks to external sources. In April, David Petraeus, the retired general and former Central Intelligence Agency director, was fined $100,000 for inappropriately handling classified material that he shared with his lover.

However, Mrs Clinton's case differs from traditional alleged breaches of rules, because the allegations focus on whether classified information was handled properly internally.

"Secretary Clinton has repeatedly claimed that the work-related emails on her private home server did not include classified information, but we know that is not true," said John Boehner, the Republican speaker of the House of Representatives. "She has claimed she is well aware of what matters are classified and what are not, and yet she set up a personal email server to discuss matters of national security despite guidance to the contrary from both her state department and the White House. Her poor judgment has undermined our national security and it is time for her to finally do the right thing."

The Clinton campaign did not respond to a request for comment.

Clinton: Focus more on workers than on profits // The Hill // Ben Kamisar - July 24, 2015

Companies must ditch the devotion to quarterly profits and provide for its workers, not just shareholders, Hillary Clinton pressed in a speech Friday in which she backed a $15 per hour minimum wage for New York fast-food workers.

“Quarterly capitalism, as developed over recent decades, is neither legally required or economically sounds. It’s bad for business, bad for wages and bad for our economy and fixing it will be good for everyone,” she said.

On top of sharing additional details of her economic plan and promising a broader outline for tax reform, Clinton endorsed the New York state proposal to raise the minimum wage for state fast-food workers.

That move comes as her Democratic presidential rivals, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, have coalesced around a national $15 per hour minimum wage.

But Clinton has repeatedly bucked calls to join that chorus, characterizing the minimum wage as a policy that should be handled on a state-by-state basis and noting that the cost of living in New York City is far higher than that in Little Rock, Ark.

“The national minimum wage is a floor, and it needs to be raised,” Clinton said.

“What you can do in L.A. or in New York may not work in other places.”

Clinton panned companies that privilege stockholders at the expense of workers, noting that large public companies return more than eight out of every 10 dollars of earnings back to shareholders.

“That doesn’t leave much money to build a new factory or a research lab or to train workers or give them a raise,” she said.

“It’s time to return to an old-fashioned idea: that companies’ responsibility to their shareholders also encompasses a responsibility to employees, customers, communities and ultimately to our country and, yes, to our planet.”

She also called for a sliding scale that would increase capital gains taxes — taxes on investment sales — depending on how many years the seller has held the investment for. That would encourage people to hold onto investments longer by punishing rapid-fire transactions with higher taxes.

Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) is rebutting reports that the State Department has formally requested a federal criminal investigation into Hillary Clinton’s use of a private email server while she was secretary of State.

"I spoke personally to the State Department inspector general on Thursday, and he said he never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage,” Cummings, the top Democrat on the House Select Committee on Benghazi, said Friday in a statement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, State Inspector General Steve A. Linick, “told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the [Freedom of Information Act] review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified."

The Democratic presidential candidate has faced repeated criticism for her private email use, with Benghazi panel members refusing to schedule her testimony until records they've demanded are handed over.

The New York Times reported Thursday that a criminal request was made by two inspectors general following a June 29 memo to Under Secretary of State for Management Patrick F. Kennedy that found Clinton’s email server held “hundreds of potentially classified emails."

State is reviewing the emails from Clinton’s serve for public release. The first batch of more than 1,900 emails was released June 30.

In that initial group, portions of some emails were redacted because they became classified, but none were marked as classified at the time Clinton handled them.

The inspectors general told Kennedy in a July 17 memo that at least one released email contained information that was classified, but did not identify what it was.

For his part, Cummings said the select committee “has obtained zero evidence that any emails to or from Secretary Clinton were marked as classified at the time they were transmitted, although some have been retroactively classified since then.”

“This is the latest example in a series of inaccurate leaks to generate false front-page headlines – only to be corrected later – and they have absolutely nothing to do with the attacks in Benghazi or protecting our diplomatic corps overseas,” said Cummings, who also serves as ranking member on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform.

Hillary Clinton email inquiry not linked to criminal wrongdoing, official says // Guardian // July 24, 2015

US investigators have asked the Justice Department to look into a “potential compromise of classified information” surrounding the private email server used by former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, a department official said on Friday.

The official said the referral by the investigators did not relate to possible criminal wrongdoing, despite saying earlier on Friday that it did. Another US official said it was unclear whether classified information was mishandled and that the referral did not necessarily suggest any wrongdoing by Clinton, the leading Democratic candidate in the 2016 presidential race.

The officials were not authorized to discuss the referral publicly and spoke only on condition of anonymity.

Clinton’s campaign said she had “followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials”.

“Any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted,” campaign spokesman Nick Merrill said in a statement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Merrill also criticised the New York Times, which first reported the referral by the inspectors general.

"It is now more clear than ever that the New York Times report claiming there is a criminal inquiry sought in Hillary Clinton's use of email is false," he said.

Merrill added: "It has now been discredited both by the Justice Department and the ranking member of the House oversight committee [Democrat Elijah Cummings]. This incident shows the danger of relying on reckless, inaccurate leaks from partisan sources."

In a speech in New York on Friday afternoon, Clinton said there had been "a lot of inaccuracies" in reports about her email. She added: "We are accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part."

It was not immediately clear if the Justice Department would investigate the matter, but the existence of the referral suggests that Clinton is likely to face lingering questions during the presidential campaign over her personal email account – an issue that has dogged her for months and that Republicans have used to criticize her.

"The number of questions surrounding secretary Clinton's unusual email arrangement continues to grow," said representative Trey Gowdy, a South Carolina Republican who is chairing a special committee investigating the 2012 deadly attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

Reince Priebus, chairman of the Republican National Committee, reiterated his call for Clinton to turn over her personal email server to an independent third party.

Facing questions in March, Clinton said that as secretary of state she had used a personal email account as a matter of convenience to limit the number of electronic devices she used. She maintained then that she had never sent classified information. Earlier this month, the State Department made public some 3,000 emails involving Clinton covering March through December 2009, and is under court order to make regular further releases of such correspondence.

The aim is for the department to unveil 55,000 pages of her emails by 29 January 2016. But a federal judge this month chastised the State Department for moving too slowly in providing the Associated Press with thousands of emails submitted through the Freedom of Information Act.

The Justice Department receives many referrals that it decides not to take up, and decisions about what to pursue often take some time.

Hillary Clinton decries Wall Street's 'quarterly capitalism' in tax reform pitch // Guardian // Ben Jacobs - July 24, 2015

In a speech on reforming "quarterly capitalism", Hillary Clinton struck a far more cautious note on Wall Street reform than her opponents for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Addressing an audience at New York University on Friday afternoon, the former secretary of state outlined a proposal to reshape the federal tax code. She said this would encourage investors to focus on "long-term growth" and abandon "a culture of short-term speculation".

Clinton said that while she understood "that most CEOs are simply responding to very real pressures from shareholders and the market to turn in good quarterly numbers ... the system is out of balance".

To the former secretary of state, "real value comes from long-term growth and not short-term profits".

Clinton outlined "five areas of focus", including taxing capital gains on a six-year sliding scale; doubling the period of time that capitol gains are taxed at the top rate of 39.6%; and condemning the influence of activist shareholders "determined to extract the maximum profit in the minimum amount of time".

The former secretary of state also called for changing corporate incentives on CEO pay and, in particular, implementing regulations on disclosure of CEO pay under the 2010 Dodd-Frank Act.

Clinton again endorsed raising the minimum wage. While she fell short of endorsing a nationwide minimum wage of $15 an hour, as demanded by many on the left, she did endorse a proposal to raise the minimum wage to that level for fast-food workers in New York City and noted "the high cost of living in Manhattan".

The speech prompted criticism from both sides of the political spectrum. On the right, a spokesman for the presidential campaign of the Republican Florida senator Marco Rubio repeated a familiar attack line by condemning Clinton's proposals as "the outdated policies of yesterday".

On the left, Charles Chamberlain, the executive director of the progressive group Democracy for America, said the former secretary of state had not gone far enough in her proposals for Wall Street reform.

"Working to end short-termism on Wall Street will definitely help working families in important ways," said Chamberlain.

"But let's be really clear: the Democratic party doesn't want, and the American people don't need, another Democratic president who tip-toes around Wall Street's insatiable greed, makes corporate shills like Third Way happy, or portrays common sense, time-tested solutions to 'Too Big to Fail' like Glass-Steagall as too simplistic."

Hillary Clinton likely 'mishandled' secrets because too much is classified // Guardian // Trevor Timm - July 24, 2015

The minute that private email server Hillary Clinton used for work emails as Secretary of State became a controversy, it was clear that evidence would surface showing that classified information passed through that address – despite her repeated denials.

Of course there was "secret" information in her emails – but not because she had attempted to cover up smoking gun Benghazi emails like conspiracy-addled Republicans hoped. It's because the US classification system is so insanely bloated and out of control that virtually everything related to foreign policy and national security is, in some way or another, classified.

And now it's finally happened: the New York Times reported late Thursday that two internal government watchdogs have recommended that the Justice Department open a criminal investigation into Clinton's private email account, because the cache of 55,000 emails from her now-deleted server reportedly include "hundreds of potentially classified emails".

Even before the New York Times report on Thursday, the State Department had already "retroactively" classified a bunch of information in the first tranche of emails released to the public as part of a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit. As experts pointed out at the time, it was “highly unusual” for the government to be classifying information six years after the fact.

Why would Clinton repeatedly and forcefully denied that the email account had any classified information on it? It’s hard to imagine she could not have known how broadly the government blankets its work with a secrecy stamp.

Just look at the hundreds of thousands of leaked State Department cables addressed to Clinton in 2010 and 2011, published by Wikileaks, that caused her State Department so many headaches. Along with extremely important information, the cables were full of mundane facts, already-public information and unsubstantiated gossip that were marked “secret” by government classifiers for no other reason than they could.

As the Federation of American Scientists’ Steven Aftergood said at the time: “Many officials in the State Department and elsewhere use classified as a default setting…It diminishes the meaning of the classified stamp. It ceases to be an index of national security sensitivity and it becomes a mere bureaucratic artifact.”

The same can be said for any federal agency that has anything to do with foreign policy or national security. Over-classification is why any journalism investigation into the State Department or CIA or NSA worth its salt is inevitably is full of classified information – which puts reporters’ sources at risk of prosecution, even if the information clearly in the public interest and plainly would not harm national security. (The countless examples of absurd levels of government secrecy and staggering numbers of people with access to it have been tallied elsewhere many times.)

But the chances of Clinton being prosecuted for “mishandling classified information” are about as close to none as you can get – not because she didn’t break the law (one suspects it will eventually come out that she technically did, if only because the secrecy laws are impossible not to break), but because the prosecution “crimes” involving classified information in the US is so shamefully biased.

As we have seen over and over in the last few years, infractions involving government secrets committed by low-level officials without connections lead to jail time, but high-ranking officials with well-placed friends get a slap on the wrist or nothing at all (or even sometimes they get promoted). There’s no debate which category Clinton falls into.

However, Clinton – who has been dogged by criticisms of being overly secretive her entire career – could turn this scandal into an advantage and make transparency a campaign issue. There’s a non-controversial Freedom of Information Act reform bill she could get behind. She could call for increased funding for Foia departments throughout government - the State Department is claiming they are so deluged with such requests that they can’t respond to anyone in a timely manner, after all. More importantly, she could take on the much larger challenge of dismantling the corrupt and arbitrary secrecy system once and for all.

The late Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart wrote in the famous Pentagon Papers case in 1971:

For when everything is classified, then nothing is classified, and the system becomes one to be disregarded by the cynical or the careless, and to be manipulated by those intent on self-protection or self-promotion.

Almost 44 years later, it’s clear Potter’s statement has never been more true – as Clinton is now finding out.

Hillary Clinton calls for shift in corporate priorities to help workers // Newsday // James T. Madore - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Friday called on U.S. corporations and investors to focus on long-term investments in workers, equipment and factories.

The leading Democratic presidential candidate decried "hit-and-run shareholders" and rich CEOs who put short-term profits over expenditures on new products and worker training.

Clinton, speaking at New York University's Stern School of Business, proposed raising the capital gains tax on the profits reaped by investors who buy and quickly dump stocks. She also said the tax code should be used to encourage investments in startups and businesses in poor regions.

Clinton outlined a five-point plan that calls for greater disclosure of CEO pay and how it relates to a business' long-term growth.

"It is clear that the system is out of balance," she told the crowd of about 200 supporters, professors and students. "Quarterly capitalism is not legally required or economically necessary. It is not good for our country."

Clinton spoke amid new questions about her email use while U.S. secretary of state during President Barack Obama's first term.

Two inspectors general have requested that the U.S. Justice Department launch a criminal probe into whether sensitive information was mishandled in connection with her private email account, The New York Times reported, citing memos obtained from an unnamed source.

Clinton has maintained that her email contained no classified information. Her spokesman declined to comment to the Times.

The latest developments in the email controversy came as Clinton sought to focus attention on what her campaign says is her blueprint for "shifting corporate culture" that has resulted in wage stagnation and increased anxiety in the middle class.

Clinton's speech at NYU is among several the former first lady and former New York senator plans to detail her economic platform. They follow her first major speech on the economy, delivered July 13 nearby at The New School.

Clinton, in that earlier address, called for "reforms to help CEOs and shareholders alike focus on the next decade, not just the next day."

She said stagnant wages are the "defining economic challenge of our time." She called for raising the federal minimum wage, making it easier for women to enter the workforce and cracking down on Wall Street malfeasance.

"I believe we have to build a growth and fairness economy," she said.

Separately Friday, Clinton endorsed the New York State Fast-Food Wage Board's recommendation on Wednesday that the minimum wage for employees of chain restaurants rise to $15 per hour by 2021.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I agree with the New York proposal ... the minimum wage is a floor, and it needs to be raised," she said, referring to the federal wage rate of $7.25 per hour. "New York is right to go higher because the costs are higher here."

Wrapping up the 34-minute speech, Clinton emphasized her support of capitalism, saying it was responsible for the United States' past prosperity.

"But it needs to be reinvented," she said to loud applause. "It needs to be put back into balance."

Clinton plans to spend the weekend and Monday campaigning in Iowa, home of the first presidential caucuses in January. She will meet supporters and address groups of civil servants and teachers, according to campaign officials.

What's in those classified Clinton emails? // McClatchy // Corrine Kennedy - July 24, 2015

Of the 3,000 Hillary Clinton emails made public June 30, 22 had sections redacted because they contained information pertaining to national security, foreign relations or U.S. actions in a foreign country.

Officials said the redactions were made to prepare the emails for publication and that the information was not classified at the time Clinton sent or received the emails.

Many of the classified emails involved North Korea, which was holding two American journalists in detention at the time. These emails, all from 2009, were dated March 30, April 1 and May 16, 22 and 15. Another email, dated May 25, provided background for a call with Japanese, Russian, Chinese and South Korean foreign ministers in the wake of a North Korean nuclear test.

Other popular topics in 2009 were Haiti – three emails dated June 16, July 15 and Oct. 25 – and Sri Lanka, two dated May 16, which was ending a 25-year civil war about the same time the emails were sent. Other emails involved Honduras, which had experienced a coup a few months prior to the Oct. 25, 2009, email, and Egypt, referenced on Nov. 27, 2009. The subject of other emails is hard to ascertain because of the amount redacted.

All of the emails except one appear to be sent from or to State Department officials.

The exception is one 2009 email from Sid Blumenthal, on July 26, longtime adviser to the Clinton and her husband, the former president.

Blumenthal forwards Clinton an email from Joe Wilson, diplomat and husband of ex-CIA agent Valerie Plame, and asks her how a recent visit with German Chancellor Angela Merkel in Berlin went.

Clinton responds, “Berlin was terrific. Lots of good exchanges w leaders.” The rest of the message was classified.

Republicans on Friday seized on a New York Times report that said two inspectors general had asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information had been mishandled.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's presidential campaign said the story was false and asked the newspaper for a correction.

A subsequent statement from I. Charles McCullough III and Steve Linick, the inspectors general, agreed that they had not made a criminal referral. But in their statement they said they had uncovered four emails that have yet to be made public that did contain classified information and that should not have been on a non-government server.

"These emails contained classified information when they were generated, and, according to IC classification officials, that information remains classified today," the two officials wrote. "This classified information should never have been transmitted via an unclassified personal system."

Their referral to "security officials within the executive branch" was consistent with laws that require they report "potential compromises of national security information."

Of course, what's in those yet-be-released emails is unknown.

Hillary Clinton Email Scandal Could Turn into Criminal Investigation // Gawker // Sam Biddle - July 24, 2015

Update: The New York Times has altered and corrected its original report:

An earlier version of this article and an earlier headline, using information from senior government officials, misstated the nature of the referral to the Justice Department regarding Hillary Clinton's personal email account while she was secretary of state. The referral addressed the potential compromise of classified information in connection with that personal email account. It did not specifically request an investigation into Mrs. Clinton.

The March revelation that presumptive presidential nominee Hillary Clinton was using a secret, possibly insecure email server immediately damaged her public image. Now, the New York Times reports, it could lead to criminal charges.

According to the Times:

Two inspectors general have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account Hillary Rodham Clinton used as secretary of state

This comes after months of scrutiny of Clinton's inbox, including a Gawker/ProPublica exposé revealing her use of an off-the-books foreign intel-gathering network.

The request to the Justice Department follows a series of memos from Steve Linick and I. Charles McCullough, inspectors general for the State Department and intelligence community, respectively. You can read the memos in full below, but this portion, dated July 17th, seems to implicate Clinton in the possibly illegal use of classified materials passing through her personal email account, hdr22@clintonemail.com :

Hillary Clinton Email Scandal Could Turn into Criminal Investigation

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Times says there's no word out of the Justice Department as to whether they'll pursue a criminal probe of the Clinton server, but the House Select Committee on Benghazi—which has basically just become the Select Committee on Hillary Clinton's Email—released this statement:

Committee Members on both sides have been aware of concerns about classified emails within the self-selected records turned over by Secretary Clinton. The Committee appreciates that Inspectors General appointed by President Obama have confirmed this is a serious and nonpartisan national security matter by any objective measure. This certainly merits further review by the Executive Branch to determine the legal and national security implications posed by the former Secretary's unusual email arrangement in order to mitigate any potential counterintelligence risks and minimize the damage caused by this scheme. These issues should be evaluated under the same strict standards that would apply to anyone found to be in possession of classified information outside of an approved system.

Hillary Clinton Alleges 'Inaccuracies' in Reports of Inquiries Into Her Emails // NY Observer // Jillian Jorgensen - July 24, 2015

Before getting to a speech on the economy today, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton took a brief moment to allege "inaccuracies" in reporting today about criminal inquiries being sought into her use of a personal e-mail address at the State Department.

"There have been a lot of inaccuracies," Ms. Clinton said at New York University this afternoon.

Ms. Clinton continues to face scrutiny over emails she sent from a personal address while she was Secretary of State, with the New York Times reporting last night two inspector generals had requested a criminal investigation into the emails. Today, the Wall Street Journal reported that the inspectors found at least four emails from the personal address that contained information deemed "secret," and which was classified, at the time they were sent.

Ms. Clinton's campaign has insisted the reports of a criminal inquiry are false and has called on the Times to issue a correction. And Congressman Elijah Cummings, ranking Democrat on the House Select Committee on Benghazi, shot down the story this morning, and Ms. Clinton made reference to his rebuttal today.

"Maybe the heat is getting to everyone," Ms. Clinton said today. S he went on promise transparency, saying she would continue to release e-mails (though critics note many have been deleted).

"I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House Committee," Ms. Clinton said. "We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part. But I'm aso going to stay focused on the issues, parituclarly the big issues that matter to American families."

Hillary Clinton resurrects '90s tax policy // Washington Times // S.A. Miller - July 24, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton on Friday proposed resurrecting tax policies from the time of her husband, former President Bill Clinton, that she promised would promote long-term investments and build a stronger economy.

Mrs. Clinton's plan would replace the current two-tiered tax on capital gains — the profit from selling stock or other assets — with a six-year graduated rate that penalized wealthy investors for selling too early.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This means from the moment investors buy into a company they’ll be more focused on its future growth strategy than its immediate profits. And so will some of its executives who are paid in part with stock or stock options,” she said in a speech at the New York University’s School of Business.

The reform of capital gains taxes was part of Mrs. Clinton’s broader agenda that she says will prod business and Wall Street to look beyond quarterly earnings reports and behave in ways that are better for American’s long-term economic health.

“American business needs to break free form the tyranny of today’s earning report so they can do what they do best: innovate, invest and build tomorrows prosperity,” she said.

The plan immediately came under fire from Republican presidential candidate Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida.

“With tax policy nearly identical to what we had in 1997, Hillary Clinton is stuck in the outdated policies of yesterday,” said Rubio campaign spokesman Alex Conant. “Just like we saw in the ‘97 hit flick ‘Titanic,’ Hillary Clinton’s tax proposal picks winners and losers, and ultimately leaves behind the working class. Marco Rubio will modernize our tax code to create more good paying jobs and help middle-class families in the 21st century.”

Capital gains are currently taxes at two rates, a top rate of 43.4 percent for investments held less than a year and 23.8 percent for anything beyond a year.

“That may count as long-term for my baby granddaughter but not for the American economy,” Mrs. Clinton said. “It’s no way to run a tax system, so as president I would move to a six-year sliding scale that provides real incentives for long-term investments.”

Her proposal, which resembles the capital gains tax rates adopted in 1997 by Mr. Clinton, would treat capital gains as ordinary income for the first two years for taxpayers in the top bracket, subjecting it to the top rate of 43.4 percent.

After two years, the rate would decrease gradually over four years until it reached the current rate of 23.8 percent, Mrs. Clinton said.

Hillary Clinton’s private email account triggers criminal inquiry request // Washington Times // David Sherfinski and Maggie Ybara - July 24, 2015

Some of former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's emails had classified information in them, though they weren't specifically labeled classified at the time, and at least one of those emails has already been put out in public by the department, its inspector general has concluded.

The revelations, contained in 13 pages of memos released by the State Department inspector general, could pose problems for Mrs. Clinton, who had insisted she never trafficked in classified information while using her own assigned email account and server, kept at her New York home, rather than an official, secure email account.

The New York Times, which first reported on the potential problems, said the State Department and intelligence community inspectors general had referred the matter to the Justice Department for possible criminal prosecution. The paper printed a correction Friday, retracting the claim of a criminal referral and saying Mrs. Clinton wasn't specifically targeted in the referral.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Justice Department official Friday confirmed a referral of "the potential compromise of classified information" but said it was not a criminal referral. Earlier Friday, the department had confirmed to The Washington Times and other news outlets that it did receive a criminal referral.

Mrs. Clinton, speaking Friday at an unrelated event in New York City, said that "there have been a lot of inaccuracies."

"Maybe the heat is getting to everybody," Mrs. Clinton said. "We all have a responsibility to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails. I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House committee. We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part."

For now, the revelations remain a black eye for President Obama's State Department, which has struggled to handle Mrs. Clinton's email scandal, and now stands accused of releasing classified information it shouldn't have.

Both the State Department and intelligence community inspectors general looked into Mrs. Clinton's emails and concluded information contained in them should be withheld from the public because it should be classified.

Their memo urged the State Department to enact better controls to make sure the emails being put out in public weren't divulging secrets.

"ICIG has received confirmation from IC FOIA officials that several of these emails contained classified IC information, though they were not marked as classified. In addition, at least one of these emails has been released to the public and can be accessed on the Department's FOIA website," the investigators said.

The State Department is reviewing about 55,000 pages of emails Mrs. Clinton belatedly turned over nearly two years after she left office. Officials have already determined that some of the information in the messages should be retroactively classified.

Mrs. Clinton has said she set up the separate account on a private server largely out of convenience, and her office has said she did not send or receive classified information on the account. But the revelation of the account has been a headache for Mrs. Clinton in the early throes of her second White House run.

A Clinton spokesman said she "followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials."

"As has been reported on multiple occasions, any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted," spokesman Nick Merrill said.

On Friday, the top Democrat on the House Select Committee investigating the Sept. 11, 2012, terrorist attack on a U.S. compound in Benghazi pushed back strongly on the initial report.

"Over the past hour, I spoke personally with the State Department inspector general and the Intelligence Community inspector general together, and they both confirmed directly to me that they never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage," Rep. Elijah Cummings, Maryland Democrat, said in a statement Friday afternoon, saying they characterized it as a "routine" referral.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, South Carolina Republican and the panel's chairman, said committee members on both sides have been aware of concerns about classified emails within the "self-selected record" turned over by Mrs. Clinton.

"The committee appreciates that inspectors general appointed by President Obama have confirmed this is a serious and nonpartisan national security matter by any objective measure," Mr. Gowdy said in a statement. "This certainly merits further review by the Executive Branch to determine the legal and national security implications posed by the former secretary's unusual email arrangement in order to mitigate any potential counterintelligence risks and minimize the damage caused by this scheme. These issues should be evaluated under the same strict standards that would apply to anyone found to be in possession of classified information outside of an approved system."

Mr. Gowdy reiterated his call for Mrs. Clinton to turn over her private server for an independent forensic evaluation.

"Regardless of whether the server is voluntarily relinquished or acquired by other lawful means, there is clearly sufficient cause to examine the contents of said server for the presence of other classified information," Mr. Gowdy said. "Moreover, whether it was classified initially or later classified, it is appropriate for the executive branch and intelligence community to determine where these now classified documents are housed and by whom they are possessed."

DOJ: No, We Weren't Asked To Launch A Criminal Probe Into Clinton's Emails // TPM // Catherine Thompson - July 24, 2015

The U.S. Justice Department said Friday that, contrary to media reports, it did not receive a request to open a criminal investigation into how sensitive information was handled in Hillary Clinton's private emails.

The New York Times reported Thursday that two inspectors general asked the Justice Department "to open a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account Hillary Rodham Clinton used as secretary of state." The language of that report originally cast Clinton as a target of the requested probe, but notably was changed after Times reporters received complaints from Clinton's presidential campaign.

The agency now says that it what it received was "not a criminal referral," but a request related to the potential compromise of classified information, according to Washington Post report Sari Horowitz:

Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-MD), the top Democrat on the select House committee investigating the Benghazi attacks, also rejected the notion that the inspectors general of the State Department and intelligence agencies asked for a criminal probe into Clinton's email account.

"I spoke personally to the State Department inspector general on Thursday, and he said he never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage," Cummings said in a statement, as quoted by The Hill.

Cummings added that the State Department inspector general "told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the [Freedom of Information Act] review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified," according to The Hill.

Justice Dept. May Probe 'Compromise' of Classified Info In Hillary Clinton's Email // National Journal // Ben Geman - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The inspector general for the intelligence community has contacted the Justice Department about the presence of emails in former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's private account that contained classified information.

A spokeswoman for I. Charles McCullough, III, the intelligence community IG, said he sent a referral to the FBI earlier this month.

"The letter IC IG sent to FBI earlier this month was a counterintelligence referral indicating there is a compromise of classified national security information in former Sec. Clinton's emails. The emails exist on a at least one private server and thumb drive and that was the counterintelligence information concern we referred to the FBI," said spokesman Andrea Williams in an email.

A Justice Department official said Friday that "The Department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information. It is not a criminal referral." Earlier in the day, Justice referred to it as a "criminal referral" before revising the statement.

The spokeswoman for McCullough noted that "We don't make criminal referrals – that is over to FBI to decide how to proceed." And late Friday afternoon, McCullough's office and the State Department IG issued a joint statement that further explains the action, calling it a "security referral for counterintelligence purposes."

The Justice Department does not appear to have made a decision about whether to launch an inquiry.

The New York Times first reported the referral late Thursday night.

The revelation is certain to intensify interest in Clinton's unusual private server arrangement during her time as secretary of State as the 2016 elections draw closer.

At the outset of a speech on the economy Friday afternoon, Clinton made brief comments about the revelation and the Times' story, which her campaign has pushed back against and has been modified since first publishing. "There have been a lot of inaccuracies," she said. "Maybe the heat is getting to everybody—we all have a responsibility to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails. I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House committee.

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right and I will do my part. But I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that matter to American families."

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Clinton's presidential campaign, said in a statement that Clinton "followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials."

"As has been reported on multiple occasions, any released emails deemed classified by the administration have been done so after the fact, and not at the time they were transmitted," he said.

The referral stems from a review by the inspectors general for the Intelligence Community and the Department of State's handling of emails. Several memos from the internal watchdogs made public Friday identified problems with State's management, under public records law, of emails containing classified information.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Friday McCullough's office released a memo that was provided on Thursday to the leaders of the congressional intelligence committees about the status of the review of State's protocols. It notes that State has discovered that there are "potentially hundreds" of emails in the 55,000 pages worth that Clinton turned over to her former agency that may contain classified information.

The memo also reveals that a limited review conducted by McCullough's office of 40 emails revealed four that contained classified intelligence community information "which should have been marked and handled at the SECRET level." Those emails have not been released by the State Department, according to the memo from the intelligence community and State Department inspectors general.

Andrea Williams, the spokesman for the Intelligence Community IG, said the four emails with classified information turned up in the IG's limited review "were classified when they were sent and are classified now."

The joint statement from the IGs on the review of Clinton's emails notes that while these four messages contained "classified IC-derived information," they did not contain "classification markings" or "dissemination controls." The statement says the information "should never have been transmitted via an unclassified personal system."

The memo from McCullough to the lawmakers also notes that the roughly 30,000 emails Clinton turned over to the State Department late last year are "purported" to have been copied to a thumb drive in the possession of Clinton attorney David Kendall. McCullough notes that because his office's limited sampling turned up four emails with classified intelligence community information, he decided to refer the matter to the FBI as well as other counterintelligence officials.

The joint memo he issued with State's IG expands on the reason for the referral, stating: "The main purpose of the referral was to notify security officials that classified information on at least one private server and thumb drive that are not in the government's possession." The intelligence community IG is required under law to refer potential compromises of national security information to the "appropriate" intelligence community security officials.

The McCullough memo also exposes a disagreement between State and the intelligence community IG about the portion of Clinton's emails already made public.

"My office discovered that an inadvertent release of classified national security information had already occurred in the State FOIA process as a result of insufficient coordination with Intelligence Community (IC) elements. (State personnel continue to deny the classified character of the released information despite a definitive determination from the IC Interagency FOIA process)," it states.

According to the Intelligence Community IG's spokeswoman, there has been at least one email released that contained classified national security information.

The memo provides a summary of the recommendations for preventing inadvertent release of classified information.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, the GOP leader of the House Select Committee on Benghazi, on Friday renewed his call for Clinton's private email server to be turned over to a third party for review.

"Regardless of whether the server is voluntarily relinquished or acquired by other lawful means, there is clearly sufficient cause to examine the contents of said server for the presence of other classified information. Moreover, whether it was classified initially or later classified, it is appropriate for the Executive Branch and intelligence community to determine where these now classified documents are housed and by whom they are possessed," he said in a statement.

Following conflicting accounts of the scope of a potential Justice Dept. inquiry, Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the House committee probing the 2012 Benghazi attacks, said in a statement Friday that State's IG told him the referral was not about "Clinton's email usage."

"Instead, he told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the FOIA review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified," Cummings said.

"The Benghazi Select Committee has obtained zero evidence that any emails to or from Secretary Clinton were marked as classified at the time they were transmitted, although some have been retroactively classified since then," he said.

The State Department has released several thousand pages worth of Clinton's messages from her time as secretary of State, and more releases from the 55,000 pages she provided are expected monthly until early next year.

A State Department official defended the vetting process.

"We are working with both the State IG and the Intelligence Community's Inspector General to ensure that our review of former Secretary Clinton's emails is completed in a manner that protects sensitive and potentially classified information," the official said.

"To provide for greater cooperation through this process -- at the invitation of the Department --IC FOIA reviewers are reviewing emails and identifying those emails that might contain IC equities," the official added.

False reports of Hillary Clinton investigation just keep falling apart // Daily Kos // Laura Clawson - July 24, 2015

The false story that the Justice Department was being asked to launch a criminal investigation into Hillary Clinton continues to be shoved back into the faces of the New York Times and whoever leaked the fake version of the story. And the fact that one of the key sources of pushback is Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-MD), the top Democrat on the House Select Committee on Benghazi, might provide a wee clue as to the likely source of that leak. (There's no good explanation for the Times falling for it.)

Cummings provides more support for the fact that the investigation the State Department Inspector General wants to see is not into Clinton's actions but into the State Department's later handling of the emails she turned over:

"I spoke personally to the State Department Inspector General on Thursday, and he said he never asked the Justice Department to launch a criminal investigation of Secretary Clinton's email usage," Cummings, the top Democrat on the House Select Committee on Benghazi, said Friday in a statement.

Instead, State Inspector General Steve A. Linick, "told me the Intelligence Community IG notified the Justice Department and Congress that they identified classified information in a few emails that were part of the [Freedom of Information Act] review, and that none of those emails had been previously marked as classified."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cummings also provided another memo from the Office of the Inspector General making clear that the investigation in question wasn't about Hillary Clinton's actions, and that the classified emails were not marked as classified at the time. For more on that question, Marcy Wheeler has a great look at the practice of retroactive classification.

On top of the investigation referral not being about Hillary Clinton's actions, the Justice Department is now also saying it's not a criminal inquiry at all. Could this story have been any more screwed up?

New York Times presents another Clinton bombshell ... and again, it bombs // Daily Kos // Laura Clawson - July 24, 2015

Is this going to be the story that finally embarrasses the New York Times out of its never-mind-the-facts approach to Hillary Clinton? Late Thursday night, the Times published a story claiming that the Justice Department had been asked "to open a criminal investigation into whether Hillary Rodham Clinton mishandled sensitive government information on a private email account," only to quietly change the story to say that the Justice Department had been asked "to open a criminal investigation into whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account Hillary Rodham Clinton used." As in, the story changed from being about a potential criminal investigation into Clinton's conduct to being about a potential criminal investigation into the mishandling of sensitive information by ... someone not named.

The title of a recent memo from the Office of the Inspector General at the State Department—one of the offices the Times cites as having asked for the investigation—offers a hint:

Potential Issues Identified by the Office of the Inspector General of the Intelligence Community Concerning the Department of State's Process for the Review of Former Secretary Clinton's Emails under the Freedom of Information

Act [Emphasis added]

Clinton, of course, is no longer at the State Department and so isn't in control of how they review her emails. And the Associated Press reports that:

One U.S. official said it was unclear whether classified information was mishandled and the referral doesn't suggest wrongdoing by Clinton herself.

So the original story was all kinds of wrong. But never mind that! For a brief moment, the New York Times thought it had an anti-Hillary scoop, and boy did it run with it. The headline blared that "Criminal inquiry sought in Hillary Clinton's use of email" and one of the reporters on the story, Michael Schmidt, tweeted that:

This is not the first time this election season the Times has had reason to be embarrassed by its political coverage, and specifically its coverage of Clinton, but this may be the worst. (And the fact that I can't say confidently that it is the worst is a shocking reminder of how bad some of their other coverage has been.) They simply don't seem to have checked out their story at all, leaving open the question of whether the reporting was drawn directly from a Republican tip on the story without research into the story's accuracy, whether the newspaper's editors didn't care to establish the facts before running with an incendiary story that they knew would make a splash, or whether they just hate Hillary Clinton that much. None of the possibilities should be acceptable for anything aspiring to be the paper of record, and the unacknowledged change to the heart of the story piles on an additional shame. The Times owes its readers an apology and, more, a promise to do better from now on.

Capital Gains Tax And Long-Term Growth Topics At NYU Speech By Presidential Candidate // IB Times // Jess McHugh - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton chose a speech Friday at New York University's Stern Business School as the opportunity to detail the economic plan she would put in place if elected president. The speech elaborated on a plan she had outlined July 13.

Clinton said she would encourage long-term growth by discouraging short-term investments and cracking down on "hit-and-run activists" who were seeking immediate payouts from companies. "We need a new generation of committed, long-term investors to provide a counter-weight to the hit-and-run activists" she said.

The former U.S. secretary of state advocated for higher capital gains taxes for people who hold stocks for less than a few years. She wants to take on what she calls "quarterly capitalism" which values quarterly returns for shareholders over long-term investment. Clinton said she believed that kind of short-term thinking in the markets was a large part of what was slowing the nation's economy.

The content of the speech seemed targeted at moderate voters. Though Clinton aides said she wanted to start a broader conversation about corporate culture, this address was more directly concerned with the capital gains tax that many investors already think is a good idea.

Clinton did criticize the exorbitant paychecks of corporate executives, noting that they sometimes earn up to 300 times what their employees do. "That just doesn't make sense" said Clinton. She also said the issue of executive pay is intrinsically tied to the problem of short-term investments because "stock-heavy pay packages have created a perverse incentive."

The speech called for a raise in the federal minimum wage and the establishment of programs for middle-class corporate employees to share in corporate profits. "Corporate profits are at near-record highs, but companies are too often not choosing to reinvest those funds in innovation or their workforce," a Clinton aide told CNN Thursday.

Many observers thought her economic plan could unite progressives and moderates within the Democratic Party because it toed a subtle line and did not suggest anything too radical. “It’s a complete win-win,” said Jonathan Cowan, a former official in President Bill Clinton's administration, in conversation with Politico. “Her political imperative is to unite the growth wing and the fairness wing of the party, so she has the best shot at winning a general election."

Hillary Clinton E-mails May Prompt Further Inquiry (Updated) // Vanity Fair // Kia Makarechi - July 24, 2015

The inspectors general of the intelligence community and State Department on Friday released a joint statement confirming that a referral was made regarding the potential compromise of classified materials. They also, however, said that the probe was not, as had earlier been reported by The New York Times, a criminal inquiry.

The Justice Department also confirmed that it had received a referral, and likewise said that the referral is not criminal in nature. The department has not decided whether to open an investigation.

"There have been a lot of inaccuracies," Clinton said on Friday. "Maybe the heat is getting to everybody. We all have a responsibility to get this right."

"It is now more clear than ever than the New York Times report claiming there is a criminal inquiry sought in Hillary Clinton's use of e-mail is false," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "This incident shows the danger of relying on reckless, inaccurate leaks from partisan sources."

The Times added a correction to its story, which the paper said was the product of faulty information from senior government officials.

The headline of this article has been updated in light of the above information. The original article continues below.

Call it the Energizer Bunny: the scandal over Hillary Clinton's e-mail entered yet another stage on Thursday night, when The New York Times reported that inspectors general had requested that the government open a criminal investigation on the matter.

At issue is Clinton's exclusive use of a private e-mail server—one housed in her Chappaqua, New York, home—during her tenure as secretary of state. Two inspectors general are pushing the Justice Department to investigate whether Clinton's use of the private e-mail addresses constituted a mishandling of secret government information.

According to the Times, the department has yet to decide on whether it will open a criminal probe. A Clinton spokesman told the AP that the former secretary of state "followed appropriate practices in dealing with classified materials."

The e-mail scandal has dogged Clinton's campaign for president. A poll found in July that nearly 60 percent of Americans don't believe Clinton is "honest and trustworthy," a reality Clinton dismissed in her first national TV interview of the election cycle as the product of "the kind of constant barrage of attacks that are largely fomented by and coming from the right."

Clinton insists that the use of the e-mail was a matter of convenience, that her correspondence was appropriately captured by government archiving systems, and that she did not handle classified information on the account. Some of the e-mails have been classified after the fact, but, as the Times notes, it is not clear whether she used the e-mail addresses to send or receive any material that was classified at the time.

She has turned over 55,000 pages of e-mails and asked the State Department to release them; a first batch of 3,000 documents was released last month. They revealed that Clinton frequently communicated with Sidney Blumenthal, a longtime Clinton insider whom Barack Obama's administration had barred from employment. Replete with details about ordering in dinners for late nights on the job and Clinton's misadventures with a fax machine, the e-mails also offered a glimpse into the everyday banalities of life as a cabinet official.

Hillary Clinton: Capitalism Needs to Be 'Reinvented' and 'Put Back into Balance' // The Blaze // Fred Lucas - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said capitalism must be “reinvented” during an economic address where she condemned the pursuit of short-term profits at the expense of long-term prosperity.

Delivering remarks at New York University, Clinton decried “quarterly capitalism.”

“I’m looking for new, creative, innovative, disruptive ideas that will save capitalism for the 21st century because it is the greatest engine of economic opportunity and potential that has ever been invented,” Clinton said. “It is one of the great accomplishments of the American political and economic history. It created the opportunity that so many generations of Americans took advantage of and that led to the creation of the middle class, the extraordinary economic accomplishment of our country.”

“As we’ve had to do in previous eras, it needs to be reinvented,” Clinton said of capitalism. “It needs to be put back into balance. It needs to recognize we really are all in this together. The better we all do, the more there will be for everybody to share in, to invest in, to profit from.”

Clinton talked about reforming capital gains taxes to encourage long-term investments. Her plan would tax investment more that are sold in less than a year, but less if held onto for longer, as a means of what Clinton said would encourage long-term investment and more innovation. Further, she called for expanding tax credits for those who invest in underprivileged areas.

“American business needs to break free from the tyranny of today’s earning report so that they can do what they do best, innovate, invest and build tomorrow’s prosperity,” Clinton said.

After her critique of large publicly traded companies, Clinton took a swipe at Republicans.

“Their approach to government mirrors the worst tendencies of hit and run shareholders, demanding quick payouts in the form of tax breaks for the wealthy at the expense of investing in the future,” Clinton said. “They ignore long-term challenges like climate change, poverty and inequality, failing infrastructure.”

New York Times Writes Badass Slash Fiction About Hillary Clinton Criminal Investigation // Wonkette // Kaili Joy Gray - July 24, 2015

In its pathological Liberal Media quest to catch Billary Clinton Doing Some Kind of Bad Thing That Is Bad Maybe, the New York Times published a devastating, campaign-destroying, earth-shattering, game-changing, smoking gun GOTCHA! story late Thursday night, and it was Not Excellent News for Hillary:

Criminal Inquiry Sought in Clinton’s Use of Email

Two inspectors general have asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation into whether Hillary Rodham Clinton mishandled sensitive government information on a private email account she used as secretary of state, senior government officials said Thursday.

That sounds pretty uh oh. Criminal, even! Hillary will never be president now because she will be in PRISON, for emailing sensitive classified state secrets from her personal GrammaYOLO@Hillz.com email, even though she said she only used it to plan her daughter’s wedding and talk about yoga. But no! She used it for doing crime and jeopardizing national security. Bad Hillary, no White House for you!

Just one little problem: it's not true, according to the Justice Department. Oops!

A statement issued by the Department said it had received a "referral" on the matter, although it did not say who originated it.

"It is not a criminal referral," the statement said.

But what about looking into Hillary's "use of email"? Nope, that's not true either:

The Justice Department said Friday it has been asked to investigate the "potential compromise of classified information" in connection with the private e-mail account that Hillary Rodham Clinton used while serving as secretary of state.

That's a little bit different from saying Hillary Clinton might be criminally investigated for emailing classified information, isn't it? As the Times noted in its shocking story:

In the course of the email review, State Department officials determined that some information in the messages should be retroactively classified. In the 3,000 pages that were released, for example, portions of two dozen emails were redacted because they were upgraded to "classified status." But none of those were marked as classified at the time Mrs. Clinton handled them.

So the State Department is retroactively classifying documents Hillary emailed, which were not classified at the time, but that adds up to criminal activity by Clinton, and the DOJ is ON IT, except not? Ace reporting there, The New York Times!

The paper eventually decided it regrets the error of getting the whole thing wrong, so it changed the headline and the lede and the story, and added a "correction," and it is very sorry about that, we good now?

But the interweb is forever, so you can see the changes from the original story here, thanks to NewsDiffs.

So, how did the Times fuck this up so badly? Well, it got some secret memos. Can't tell you how, it is a SECRET. But Democratic Rep. Elijah Cummings, who is a member of the House Benghazi Committee To Investigate Hillary Clinton Until They Prove She Did Benghazi, thinks he might know:

In a statement, Cummings said that "this is the latest example in a series of inaccurate leaks to generate false front-page headlines — only to be corrected later — and they have absolutely nothing to do with the attacks in Benghazi or protecting our diplomatic corps overseas."

So hmm, maybe Republicans are leaking information to the Times to try to turn a story that isn't a story into a story, for their own political gain. But nah, they would never do something like that, would they? And the Times would never play along, would it? (Yes and yes.)

Criminal Probe Sought Over Hillary Clinton's Private Emails: Reports // People // Maria Coder - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two inspectors general want a criminal probe into whether government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account that Hillary Clinton used as Secretary of State.

On the heels of a story from The New York Times, multiple sources report the Justice Department is being asked to open an investigation.

In a memo to the Undersecretary of State for management, Patrick Kennedy, the inspectors general of the State Department and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, wrote that Clinton had "hundreds of potentially classified emails" in her private email account, according to the Times, which cited "senior government officials."

The inspectors general are independent officials tasked with conducting audits, investigations and inspections in the agencies for which they're responsible.

Clinton's use of her personal account instead of a State Department one for official business started a political storm after news of it was revealed in March.

Clinton, now a Democratic presidential contender for 2016, has insisted it was "undisputed" that the State Department had okayed her email arrangement and that she did not handle classified material on her private email account.

At first the Times reported that the inspectors general sought a criminal inquiry into the way Clinton handled possible classified information with her private email while serving as Secretary of State. It's now reported that the investigation would just look at whether sensitive information was mishandled, though not necessarily mishandled by Clinton, CNN reports.

In June, Clinton turned over to the State Department 3,000 pages of her electronic correspondence – part of a batch of about 30,000 pieces.

The content included asking an assistant to fetch iced tea, comments on scheduling glitches, and exchanges with her husband, former President Bill Clinton, among other things.

The Justice Department has not yet decided if it will open an investigation, according to the Times.

A pro-O'Malley super PAC raises $289,000. That's not all that super. // WaPo // John Wagner - July 24, 2015

A super PAC supporting Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley says it will report having raised $289,000 during its first month -- a relative pittance compared to the multi-million dollar efforts by outside groups backing other candidates, including party frontrunner Hillary Rodham Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ron Boehmer, a spokesman for Generation Forward, the PAC backing the former Maryland governor, said his group was pleased with its take, given that it did not bring fundraising staff on board until the end of June, as the reporting period was about to end.

"Now it's go time," said Boehmer, a former press aide to O'Malley. "I would expect we'll have much more significant numbers to report at the next deadline."

By contrast, a quartet of outside groups supporting Clinton have said they brought in more than $24 million during the first half of the year. The largest chunk of that -- $15.6 million -- came from Priorities USA, a pro-Clinton super PAC.

Supporters of Republican Jeb Bush, meanwhile, raised $108 million for a super PAC to bolster the campaign of the former Florida governor -- a mark unmatched by any other outside group.

Groups backing a half-dozen other GOP contenders took in $10 million or more.

Boehmer said Generation Forward's money was raised from across the country and that contributions ranged in size from $25 to the "six figures." Several donors previously gave to a leadership PAC maintained by O'Malley known as O' Say Can You See. The super PAC's report is due to the Federal Election Commision by the end of the month.

By law, O'Malley's campaign can't coordinate with the super PAC supporting his presidential run. O'Malley has said that he would prefer that no super PACs -- whose donors can give unlimited sums -- get involved in the race.

Bernie Sanders, the self-described democratic socialist senator from Vermont, has gone further, discouraging super PACs from supporting his quest for the Democratic nomination. He doesn't appear to have been entirely successful, however. Word surfaced last week of a new group dubbed "Billionaires for Bernie."

The pro-O'Malley group has cut a couple of targeted Web and television ads and has said it has hired about 50 staffers do to on-the-ground organizing for O'Malley in Iowa -- with the possibility of more to come. It also hosted a gathering in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, last week after a state party dinner there that drew all five contenders for the Democratic nomination.

The figures from outside groups do not include what candidates have raised for their own campaign committees. By that measure, O'Malley is lagging both Clinton and Sanders.

Clinton has reported raising $47 million for during the past quarter quarter, followed by Sanders with $15.1 million and O'Malley with nearly $2 million.

On banks, O'Malley is both prosecutor and policy wonk // WaPo // Aaron C. Davis - July 24, 2015

As a young state's attorney in Baltimore, Martin O'Malley prosecuted a parade of drug dealers, the city's seemingly insurmountable public enemy. As mayor and, later, governor of Maryland, he often seemed most at home when facing off against some other Goliath – a Republican governor trying to take over his city's schools, for example, or the gun industry.

In his long-shot bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, O'Malley has taken on a new enemy: Wall Street and mega-banks.

During a policy speech in Washington Thursday, O'Malley blasted the nation's banking industry as everything short of evil . In the process, he showcased both the best and the worst of the political DNA he's counting on to help him dethrone Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"We need to restore robust deterrents to those who police Wall Street. We cannot assume that this is the one industry that's allowed to police itself. We need to put the cops back on the street," O'Malley said.

O'Malley named Republican majorities in Congress as co-conspirators for cutting funding for Wall Street oversight.He argued for more stringent federal monitoring of banks, and, if necessary, government action to break them up and to bring charges against executives when institutions fail.

"When there is evidence of criminal wrongdoing, we need to prosecute it," O'Malley said.

But O'Malley the prosecutor was also at times O'Malley the policy wonk, swimming in legalese so deep that some in the audience began to check their phones.

O'Malley ticked off a list of proposals, including an end to revolving doors between positions in industry and government oversight. He said the next administration must do a better job of enforcing Dodd-Frank, including a provision that requires banks to have plans for how they would safely dissolve instead of causing a chain reaction again that would destabilize the economy.

As he first proposed in March, O'Malley called for Congress to reinstate a "modern version" of the Depression-era Glass-Steagall Act, which forced banks to separate their commercial activities and more speculative investment ones. The measure was repealed by Congress in 1999.

But asked by a reporter "what's wrong with the old one, if anything?" O'Malley punted.

"Yeah," O'Malley said, kicking the question to moderator Brad Miller, a former Democratic congressman. "Maybe you have an answer to that congressman? What was wrong with the old one?"

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who is the ranking minority member of the Senate budget committee and has emerged as Clinton's chief rival so far for the Democratic nomination, has also made Wall Street largesse a theme, crowding the space for O'Malley to define what he would do differently. Asked about how he would distingush himself on banking from both Sanders and Clinton, O'Malley repeated a stump speech line that he is the only candidate among Democrats with executive experience.

Thursday's event was originally scheduled for the National Press Club, but O'Malley's campaign balked at the club's longstanding format, in which a single club-designated journalist asks follow-up questions of the candidate. The speech was held instead at the Center for National Policy, an organization whose board includes O'Malley adviser Douglas Wilson.

An Irish songwriter prone to quoting poetry, O'Malley spent some time waxing philosophical about the campaign.

"Every election, especially every national election, is the opportunity for a deeper understanding, and understanding precedes action," he said. "I think real leadership is to forge a new consensus, not to follow or submit to the straight jacket of the way things are today."

Congress needs to act on gun reform // Boston Globe // Martin O'Malley - July 24, 2015

THIS WEEK, we again watched in horror as more images of gun violence flashed across our TV and computer screens.

On Thursday, two people were killed at a movie theater in Lafayette, La. Last week, five service members were killed in Chattanooga, Tenn. And last month, nine parishioners were killed in Charleston, S.C. — solely because of their skin color.

During the first 204 days of 2015, there have been 204 mass shootings: a mass shooting for every day of the year.

These tragedies aren't isolated incidents or even "accidents" as some have called them — they're part of a full-blown epidemic.

We cannot let this become the new normal. As we mourn for the lives cut short — for the victims and the loved ones they leave behind — we can't just sit by and wait for another tragedy to happen again.

We need comprehensive gun safety laws to save lives.

This is where we should start: The federal government should limit the sale of firearms to tightly regulated, licensed dealers. That means closing the "gun show loophole" once and for all, and banning unlicensed private individuals from selling guns.

We should also impose greater restrictions on what, to whom, and where dealers can sell guns. That means banning the sale of assault weapons, increasing inspections, and establishing a national gun registry to help law enforcement track down dangerous criminals. It also means requiring gun owners to secure and safely store all firearms in their homes.

In Maryland, we implemented some of the toughest measures in the nation to crack down on gun violence. The reforms we put in place included required licensing, fingerprinting, background checks, and safety training. We ensured that these requirements applied to all buyers, whether they were acquiring a gun from a dealer, a secondary sale, or as a private gift.

We took action to keep guns off the street and make them less deadly. We banned the sale of assault weapons and limited the size of magazines. And, if a firearm was lost or stolen, we required it to be reported immediately to law enforcement.

Our goal in Maryland, as it should be for the nation, was to reduce mass shootings and keep guns out of the hands of criminals.

This wasn't easy, and we didn't get it done on the first try. It took six years — from 2007, when I first supported an assault weapons ban, until 2013 — for us to get this done. I faced strong opposition even from members of my own party. Legislators faced threats from the NRA and saw 2,000 gun-rights advocates flood the halls of the Maryland General Assembly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The same debate is playing out in Congress today. While the public strongly backs common-sense gun safety reforms, Congress has refused to act on them.

It's no surprise: With millions of dollars from the gun industry and an astronomical number of lobbyists, the National Rifle Association has been able to silence members of Congress who privately support these reforms. Their fear of retribution has led them to block even the most basic gun safety reforms.

Stopping the preventable deaths of American citizens should not be a partisan issue, or the purview of special interests. These members of Congress need to find the courage to do the right thing, without fear of the NRA's clout, come next election.

It's not enough just to "have the conversation." It's time for actual leadership and action.

O'Malley gets early backing from a California lawmaker // LA Times // Michael Memoli - July 24, 2015

A California congressman has become the first Washington lawmaker to endorse former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley in the Democratic race for president, calling him the best choice for the millennial generation.

Second-term Rep. Eric Swalwell (D-Dublin), a native Iowan, will campaign for O'Malley in that key nominating state this weekend. In a Des Moines Register op-ed, the 34-year-old Swalwell wrote that O'Malley helped inspire his decision to enter public service.

"In 2012, I ran for Congress to bring new energy and ideas to Washington, D.C., and fight for millennial issues. But my efforts alone cannot pave the pathways to opportunity millennials need," he writes. "Our generation needs Martin O'Malley in the White House."

Swalwell's endorsement is not a total surprise. Last year, we reported that he had taken on a leadership role in O'Malley's political action committee as chairman of the Young Professional Leadership Council. At the time, he praised O'Malley, who is well behind Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton in early polls, for helping raise money for Democrats in the House and said his "results-oriented, data-driven approach" to governing would appeal to younger voters.

Martin O'Malley sides with illegal immigrants in lawsuit against Texas // Washington Times // S.A. Miller - July 24, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley on Friday blasted Texas for denying birth certificates to some U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants without valid identification documents, declaring that "citizenship is a human right."

"Denying birth certificates to U.S, citizens is not only outrageous, it's unconstitutional," the former Maryland governor said in a statement released in English and Spanish.

"The 14th amendment of the U.S. Constitution could not be clearer. It states that 'all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside,' " he said. "The Texas Department of State Health services should cease this discriminatory and unconstitutional practice immediately. Citizenship is a human right."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. O'Malley has attempted to challenge Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton on immigration, proposing the most sweeping plans for amnesty and expanding rights for illegal immigrants of any candidate.

A group of 19 illegal immigrant parents and their 23 children have filed suit against the Texas Department of State Health Services after officials refused to issue birth certificates the U.S.-born children, citing invalid forms of identification.

The parents came from Mexico and Central America and live in Texas' Rio Grande Valley, along the U.S.-Mexico border. Although the parents are not citizens, their U.S.-born children are citizens by birthright under the 14th Amendment.

Texas health officials asking the judge to dismiss a lawsuit Wednesday, arguing that court lacks jurisdiction over claims against the state agency. Lawyers for the agency also argued that Texas has sovereign immunity and cannot be sued and that its policy does not interfere with any federal regulation.

Texas, they said, has the "power to control the circumstances under which it will provide copies of birth certificates."

O'Malley nets first congressional endorsement // The Hill / Jonathan Easley - July 24, 2015

Rep. Eric Swalwell (D-Calif.) announced Friday he'll support Martin O'Malley (D) for president, giving the former Maryland governor his first endorsement from a member of Congress.

In an op-ed published in The Des Moines Register, Swalwell, a 34-year-old lawmaker serving his second term in the House, described O'Malley as a "friend and mentor" who inspired him as a college student at the University of Maryland to seek a life in public service after seeing O'Malley speak.

"He spoke to my class about our civic duty to help others, unify communities and offer solutions for the common good," Swalwell wrote. "I was hooked. I watched him lead not just with words but by deeds, and I committed myself to following his example of service to others."

Hillary Clinton is far outpacing her Democratic rivals in the race for congressional endorsements.

According to The Hill's whip list, the former secretary of State and presidential front-runner has the support of 85 members of the House and 30 senators.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who has emerged as Clinton's biggest challenger, does not have any congressional endorsements.

O'Malley is struggling to gain traction in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

According to the RealClearPolitics average of polls, he's stuck at 1 percent support nationally, trailing Clinton, Sanders, Vice President Biden, who has not entered the race, and former Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.).

O'Malley has sought to set himself apart by releasing a series of detailed policy proposals that have been well-received by many liberals. But so far Sanders is the candidate galvanizing the liberal base and chipping away at Clinton's lead in the polls.

Our generation needs Martin O'Malley in the White House // Des Moines Register // Rep. Eric Swalwell - July 24, 2015

I was born in Sac City, Iowa and this weekend, I am proud to be back in the Hawkeye state to endorse my friend and mentor, Martin O'Malley for President.

In 2001, when he was the Mayor of Baltimore, O'Malley visited my government class when I was just a 20-year-old college student at the University of Maryland. I was broke and between a vise of increasing college tuition and few ideas of what I wanted to do upon graduation. O'Malley was 38 years old, and at that point in my life, the youngest high-profile leader I had met.

He spoke to my class about our civic duty to help others, unify communities and offer solutions for the common good. I was hooked. I watched him lead not just with words but by deeds, and I committed myself to following his example of service to others. Inspired by O'Malley, I would go on to attend his alma mater, the University of Maryland School of Law, start my career as a prosecutor, and later serve on my local city council.

Now, at 34, I have the honor and responsibility of being a voice for 80 million millennials as a Representative in the United States Congress.

The greatest challenges facing our generation are the increasing barriers to opportunity: harder and costlier paths to higher education, and fewer good paying jobs once you graduate. Our generation needs a leader like O'Malley in the White House. I know he is the leader our generation needs, because I have personally needed him before. And he did not let me down.

In 2003, I was a senior at the University of Maryland, College Park and Republican Bob Ehrlich had just been sworn in as Governor. Governor Ehrlich immediately took an ax to public education, cutting funding to state universities, and to add insult to injury, raising tuition for students.

Under those conditions, I could barely finish college and go on to law school. I still remember the countless notices from the bursar's office: "This is your last warning, if you do not pay your tuition, you will be dropped from classes."

I and thousands of college students facing similar pressure needed someone who would relieve the burden. Fortunately, Mayor O'Malley became Gov. O'Malley and he kept his word to restore funding of the state's university system and reduce the cost of tuition for students.

Gov. O'Malley expanded education funding even during the height of the recession, and Maryland public schools were ranked No. 1 in the nation five years in a row. I saw first-hand how his accomplishments transformed the state and helped my generation.

Once again, millennials need O'Malley. Forty-one million young Americans are mired in $1.3 trillion in student loan debt, leaving them stuck in financial quicksand and preventing or delaying them from taking the job they want, buying a house and starting a family. Millions more in college and on their way to college face steep tuition costs and dim job prospects upon graduation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To help our generation, O'Malley has put forward a national goal of debt-free college to address the rising cost of education and assist the millions held back by debt. His bold and visionary plan would allow students to refinance student loans, link minimum payments to incomes, freeze public tuition rates, restore state higher education funding, increase Pell Grants, and expand and modernize the need-based federal work-study program.

O'Malley stood up for me when I needed him most, and today I am standing up for him.

In 2012, I ran for Congress to bring new energy and ideas to Washington, D.C and fight for millennial issues. But my efforts alone cannot pave the pathways to opportunity millennials need.

Our generation needs Martin O'Malley in the White House. I endorse Gov. O'Malley to be our next President.

Report: Two Inspectors General Seek Criminal Probe Of Hillary Clinton Email Use // The Daily Caller // Chuck Ross - July 24, 2015

Two inspectors general are asking the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation to find out whether Hillary Clinton mishandled classified emails as secretary of state.

The New York Times reports that the internal watchdogs at the State Department and the Intelligence Community are requesting the probe, but that the Justice Department has not yet said whether it will dive in.

The inspectors general sent a June 29 memo to under secretary of state for management Patrick Kennedy claiming that Clinton's records contained "hundreds of potentially classified emails."

More than two dozen of the emails out of the 55,000 pages of records Clinton turned over to the State Department in December have retroactively been deemed to be classified. One of the emails released to the House Select Committee on Benghazi in May was classified upon release. The rest were classified in June when the State Department released about 3,000 pages of Clinton emails last month.

According to The Times' senior level sources, it is not clear whether Clinton maintained classified documents on her private email server while she was in office.

Any finding that she did would pose a massive problem for the Democratic presidential candidate.

"I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email," Clinton said at a press conference in March, shortly after her private email arrangement was revealed. "There is no classified material. So I'm certainly well aware of the classification requirements and did not send classified material."

Politico reports that the State Department has acknowledged the investigation request.

"We are working with both the State IG and the Intelligence Community's Inspector General to ensure that our review of former Secretary Clinton's emails is completed in a manner that protects sensitive and potentially classified information," State Department spokesman Alec Gerlach said.

Intelligence Expert Nails Reasons For Investigation Into Hillary Emails // The Daily Caller // Casey Harper -

July 24, 2015

With news of the possible criminal investigation into Hillary Clinton's email use, one intelligence expert took to Twitter to sum up the situation.

The New York Times reports that two Inspector Generals have called for a criminal probe into Hillary Clinton's email use after news that she used her private email instead of a secure government email to send and receive classified information, which would be illegal.

There's a lot of confusion surrounding Clinton's emails and their significance, but Marc Ambinder, a journalist who literally wrote the book on classified intelligence, fired off a string of tweets worth reading.

That question will be at the heart of any investigation, and Ambinder says the answer is a definitive yes.

"Every security officer would tell you unequivocally yes. Derivatively classified. Or you own judgment should tell you it that it …" Ambinder tweeted. "Ought to be, and it's your responsibility as a public official with privileged access to secrets to make those distinctions."

Ambinder said that if someone types classified information privately emails it, that person "is legally liable if discovered."

"I doubt any Clinton associate would knowingly use private email for obviously classified purposes. But IGs suggesting they had obligation to ensure that any inbound or outbound email was as free of potentially classified info as possible," Ambinder tweeted. "The targets here (if any) seem to be the people who sent emails to the Clinton accounts, not the emails that Clinton and team sent. And to be fair, making these calls is not easy. But this, of course, is why a private email domain might not have been the best idea."

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders's '100% Brooklyn' Roots Show Beyond His Accent // NYT // Jason Horowitz - July 24, 2015

Ivor Williams stood on his porch and stared suspiciously at the visitor who was pointing to the attic of his pink and shingled house near Brooklyn College.

"I used to live here," Steve Slavin explained, to no noticeable reaction from Mr. Williams. Then he uttered the magic words: "With Bernie Sanders."

"Bernie?" Mr. Williams, a 78-year-old immigrant from Guyana, exclaimed. "I was just watching Bernie on the TV."

Hillary Rodham Clinton may be a former senator from New York who located her campaign headquarters in Brooklyn Heights, but all it takes to know who really represents Brooklyn in the race for the Democratic nomination is for Mr. Sanders to open his mouth and utter a few syllables.

As Mr. Sanders, a senator from Vermont, draws large crowds on the campaign trail and enjoys an unexpected surge, his ur-Brooklyn accent and upbringing in the heavily Jewish neighborhood of Flatbush off Kings Highway have become a particular point of pride for friends, former schoolmates and fellow progressives in the borough where he was born.

“I’m very proud of the fact that he speaks Brooklyn, because he’s not a phony and that shows,” said Marty Alpert, who used to cheer for Mr. Sanders when he was on the track team at James Madison High School, where she now is on the alumni board.

On the school’s crowded Wall of Distinction, Mr. Sanders is no longer quite so overshadowed by such alumni as Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Senator Chuck Schumer and four Nobel Prize winners, or, for that matter, Judge Judy and Cousin Brucie.

Mr. Slavin was Mr. Sanders’s roommate when they were both students at Brooklyn College. Now retired from teaching economics, Mr. Slavin recalled staying up late listening to music on Mr. Sanders’s record player and discussing Supreme Court cases, Marbury v. Madison in particular. And he remembered how Mr. Sanders would curse when they heard their loathed landlady angrily marching up the stairs.

“He was a lifer,” Mr. Slavin said, meaning that Mr. Sanders had known only one place his entire life.

In fact, Mr. Sanders was on the verge of leaving — first for the University of Chicago, where he transferred from Brooklyn College, and ultimately for Vermont.

But Brooklyn’s imprint on Mr. Sanders was not limited to his tongue. In the populist politics he has espoused for decades as a leftist activist, socialist mayor, and independent congressman and senator, those who knew Mr. Sanders, who declined to comment for this article, detect the influence of postwar Brooklyn stickball games, arguments over money between his parents and the work ethic instilled in him as a decorated long-distance runner.

“He is 100 percent Brooklyn,” said Larry Sanders, the candidate’s older brother, who decades ago traded in his Brooklyn accent for a British one when he moved to England and pursued Green Party politics.

The Sanders brothers lived with their parents in a prewar apartment building on East 26th Street that had a fake fireplace in the lobby. In apartment 2C, Mr. Sanders and his brother swapped nights in a small bedroom and living room, ate their mother’s meat-heavy dinners, and made occasional outings to the local delicatessen and Chinese restaurant.

Their father, a paint salesman who emigrated from Poland at age 17, worked out of Long Island and put 25,000 miles a year on his car. The family rarely discussed politics and, according to Larry Sanders, looked at their grandfather, “a very strong socialist,” as “eccentric.”

What their parents did talk about was money. “There were tensions about money, which I think is important,” he said. “There was no sense of long-term security. A salesman, things can go up and things can go down.”

But if that at all contributed to the senator’s economic populism, then his appreciation for an equal playing field was influenced by the self-regulating society of street games outside their house.

Sid Ganis, a past president of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, who lived downstairs from the Sanders family, recalled a roving gang of Jewish kids who would play stickball, marbles and boxball, all without adult meddling.

“In a way, when Bernard talks about cooperatives and so on, he is drawing on something that was real for many years,” his brother said. “That the people who did it, ran it.”

Mr. Sanders went to elementary school at P.S. 197 and spent his Saturday mornings at the Nostrand movie theater watching cartoons and serials with his brother. They took occasional trips into Manhattan, including one visit to Rockefeller Center where his brother recalled a “Vermont state propaganda place” that made the brothers marvel at the affordability of the land. When Mr. Sanders married years later, he used money from his wedding presents to buy acres in Montpelier.

Mr. Sanders started attending Madison, just down the street from his family’s apartment, in 1955. Walter Block, now an economics professor and libertarian at Loyola University New Orleans, would walk to school with Mr. Sanders through what he called a “pretty pinkish” neighborhood. On Bedford Avenue, they would enter a school that was a city in itself.

With about 5,000 students and split schedules between underclassmen and juniors and seniors to thin out hallway traffic jams, there was also a hunger to move up in the world.

“We wanted to count,” said Larry Hite, a well-known commodities trader who graduated the same year as Mr. Sanders.

Mr. Sanders was a good student. He wrote for the school paper and ended up running for school president, but he had to settle for president of his class. His brother introduced him to Freud, and taught him why Thomas Paine’s “Common Sense” was superior to Edmund Burke’s conservatism.

While others would eat pizza at Louis Gino’s, hang out at the Avalon Tearoom or avoid Dubrow’s Cafeteria after school, Mr. Sanders’s free time was spent on the track. As a tall freshman with a long stride, he became one of the borough’s top long-distance runners. He became so used to winning that in one race at Prospect Park, he pushed his co-captain, Dan Jelinsky, ahead of him “so that I came in first,” Mr. Jelinsky recalled.

These days, the school is pushing Mr. Sanders out front and center. Jodie Cohen, the school’s principal, talks about how happy she was when she heard he was running. “If Bernie wins and then Chuck becomes majority leader,” she said, referring to Mr. Schumer, “all of Madison’s dreams will become a reality.”

Ms. Alpert, the alumni board member, is also enthusiastic about the attention Mr. Sanders is getting. She said that when a counterpart at nearby Midwood High School inquired about creating its own Wall of Distinction, the Madison board members responded, “Besides Woody Allen, who have you got?”

But the end of Mr. Sanders’s years at Madison was not a happy time. His mother, whose heart had been weakened by a bout of rheumatic fever as a child, had taken ill. He lost interest in track, and enrolled, unhappily, in Brooklyn College.

“He wanted to go to Harvard,” said Lou Howort, 73, a track teammate.

After Mr. Sanders’s graduation in 1959, his brother returned from Harvard Law School to be close to their mother as her condition worsened. It was around that time that Mr. Sanders rented a furnished room with Mr. Slavin on East 21st Street in the attic of a Madison Latin teacher and his wife.

Mr. Slavin said his old roommate needed some space from the tensions at home, and that Mr. Sanders was crushed when his mother died when she was just 46 after a second heart operation failed.

By the end of his year at Brooklyn College, Mr. Sanders was more than ready to leave for Chicago. When finals came around, according to Mr. Slavin, he paid less attention to his exams than to the books he brought back from the college library. He was particularly fond of a biography of John Peter Altgeld, a 19th-century progressive Illinois governor who championed child labor laws, supported striking workers and challenged the Democratic powerhouse of the time, Grover Cleveland.

Now, as he challenges the current Democratic powerhouse, Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Sanders's hometown supporters hope that a combination of his unabashed liberalism, long-distance-runner's persistence and old-school Brooklyn charm will resonate with voters.

It already does resonate with Mr. Williams, who shrugged off his own family's analysis that Mr. Sanders's being "straight-up honest" would only get him so far.

"It's great that the future president lived in my house," Mr. Williams said.

Bernie Sanders' spokesman holds down two jobs // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti - July 24, 2015

If Bernie Sanders has a shadow on the campaign trail — from Missouri to Iowa, to Arizona, to Texas, to Washington in the past two weeks alone — Michael Briggs is it. And when reporters want to reach the suddenly besieged candidate, Briggs is the man to call.

As Sanders' communications director, he draws a salary from the presidential campaign. At the same time, he's collecting his paycheck from the U.S. Senate, as the senator's communications chief since 2007.

The arrangement isn't unusual for staffers serving on Senate and House reelection campaigns. But such double duty is out of the ordinary for a high-profile presidential campaign — most other political operations rigorously separate the two responsibilities, especially for a role as public-facing as communications director.

And while Sanders' staff closely follows the time-honored procedures for government staffers working on campaigns — from making sure their salaries don't exceed the legal cap, to ensuring they don't use official property for political purposes — the arrangement illustrates the occasionally blurred lines between Sanders' presidential campaign and his Senate work.

While candidates who are sitting senators often use their access to the Senate floor and lawmaking mechanisms to introduce legislation supporting their bids, Sanders in particular has raised eyebrows with his near-mixing of Senate and campaign activity — more than Marco Rubio or Lindsey Graham, who also both have senior aides drawing two paychecks each, and more than Ted Cruz, whose Senate staff receives stipends when they correspond with the campaign side.

The questions about Sanders date back to the news conference he used to announce his run in April: because of its political nature, the campaign moved it from a Senate gallery to the grassy grounds outside the building to avoid any conflict. And he has since held multiple rallies right outside of the Capitol to push on themes that link his political plans with his legislative programs, like advocating for a $15 minimum wage on Wednesday after introducing legislation on the topic.

“Sen. Sanders is a candidate for president, but he is also a U.S. senator,” his chief of staff Michaeleen Crowell said. “He takes that responsibility seriously and Briggs works day and night to help the senator and the reporters who cover Congress.”

While the five senators currently pursuing the White House saw a wave of staff members exit their Senate chambers for their political teams over the past year, months, and weeks — some just hours before the ink was dry on the presidential paperwork — a POLITICO review of second-quarter Federal Election Commission filings showed only a handful of top-level staffers sticking around Capitol Hill as they also get a salary from the campaigns.

Briggs’ arrangement is the most prominent due to his status as a face of Sanders’ campaign, but he’s not alone: In the case of Rubio, there’s his deputy chief of staff for operations Jessica Fernandez, who the senator’s office says is splitting her time 60/40 between the Senate and campaign. And for Graham, there’s senior adviser Denise Bauld, who has no plans to commit to either side full-time anytime soon.

Capitol Hill staffers whose bosses are running for reelection or higher office — like Briggs, who will soon likely shift to a campaign-first arrangement, while keeping some Senate responsibilities — generally know they can’t talk politics on their official cellphone and that they shouldn’t talk election strategy in their boss’ taxpayer-funded offices. However, the stakes are considerably higher when it comes to presidential elections, even if the same laws apply.

The Senate Ethics Committee guidelines on how such staffers are supposed to behave are clear, said multiple lawyers working for presidential campaigns, and go beyond just making sure the aides aren’t in the Capitol when they take a political phone call. But because these rules are longstanding, the lawyers explained, campaigns have perfected ways to blur the lines for maximum convenience.

“The line is: Anything you do in your time, you’re fine to do either for pay or as a volunteer. You can’t use any resources in your congressional office. No phones, no computers. If you do any campaign activity, you’re supposed to step out of the office. My experience is that doesn’t happen,” said the Campaign Legal Center’s Meredith McGehee. “It’s an important line because taxpayer money is not supposed to be spent on the senators’ political aspirations.”

However, a number of senators bristle at tight enforcement of these regulations, say the lawyers. Some of the frustration comes from the briefings supplied by the Senate committee, which reaches out to the candidate’s offices (for example, it spoke with members of Sanders’ staff in Washington and Vermont).

“There have been a number of investigations by the House and Senate ethics committees — some haven’t become public — of the issue of members using staff for the campaigns,” said one longtime Washington attorney working for a 2016 campaign. “But the truth is the ethics committee is not great on training on this topic. If they really spelled all of this out, a lot of the senators would be upset.”

The committee guidelines allow aides to do whatever campaign activity they wish to do on their own time, without using Senate resources. And, says the committee, as a staffer spends more time on the campaign side during work hours, his or her Senate pay should shrink accordingly. Those who earn more than $121,956 on the official side aren’t allowed to bring in more than $27,225 in any outside income — including campaign work. Accordingly, Briggs has seen his Senate pay reduced as he spends more time on the campaign trail. The FEC filings showed that he pulled in nearly $9,500 in the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nonetheless, having two full staffs with some political, policy, and research functions is one of the “built-in incumbent advantages” of running as a sitting senator, said McGehee, even if such candidates run the risk of creating a perception problem. And in a case like that of Sanders, a number of former Senate staffers are now on the political team, fresh off the government payroll.

Still, the biggest legal risk in mixing campaign and official staff is also the hardest to track, said one of the lawyers advising a candidate. But even if it’s caught, it just might not get a candidate in that much trouble.

“You’ll have a problem with the junior legislative assistant who gets pulled into a project for the campaign and it’s a last-minute crisis and they end up doing it in the Senate office space. That’s a flat violation of the rules,” he said.

“If the Senate Ethics Committee notices it or files a complaint, what ordinarily would happen is they would look into it, and if they determine there was a violation, there’s a range of sanctions they could adopt. They might take some action. But it would likely just be a letter of admonition.”

What Do Anthem, Aetna, and Bernie Sanders Have in Common? // Bloomberg // John Tozzi - July 24, 2015

U.S. health insurance companies think the U.S. has too many health insurance companies.

A series of mergers have been proposed in recent weeks that would cut the number of major national insurers from five to three. In the process, the CEOs say, they would deliver savings for consumers by eliminating inefficiencies.

You know who else wants that? Bernie Sanders, the senator from Vermont, and others on the far left who have long argued that the country has too many health insurers. Instead of three mammoth insurers, however, they have proposed just one, run by the government, a system known as single-payer health care.

Obviously the insurers don't share the long-shot Democratic presidential candidate's long-shot goal of replacing the private health insurance industry with a "Medicare for all" system. But the arguments for letting giant health insurers combine are strikingly similar to some of the arguments that single-payer proponents have made for years.

Here are some things Joe Swedish, chief executive of Anthem, said on a call on June 22 announcing a bid for Cigna that would create a combined company with 53 million enrollees and $115 billion in revenue:

It would have a strong position across growth markets and the scale to drive greater efficiency and affordability for our customers. ... Customers benefit from the clear improvements in cost efficiency, choice of solutions, and continued investments in simplifying the health-care experience.

The companies announced a $48.4 billion deal on Friday. Swedish expects "synergies" to save the new company $2 billion a year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And here's an excerpt from a 2013 press release from Physicians for a National Health Program, which advocates for a single-payer system:

Upgrading the nation's Medicare program and expanding it to cover people of all ages would yield more than a half-trillion dollars in efficiency savings in its first year of operation. ... "Such a financing scheme would vastly simplify how the nation pays for care, restore free choice of physician, guarantee all necessary medical care, improve patient health and, because it would be financed by a program of progressive taxation, result in 95 percent of all U.S. households saving money," [economist Gerald] Friedman said.

Aetna CEO Mark Bertolini, announcing a merger with Humana on July 6, said the deal would "promote greater operational efficiencies that enable us to lower cost to compete with more cost-effective products and create value for our customers and provider partners." The new company, with $115 billion in combined revenue, would enjoy cost savings of $1.25 billion a year, Aetna and Humana executives said.

Put aside, for a minute, whether insurance industry mergers would deliver the savings they promise, and whether reduced competition would really lower prices for employers and consumers. Put aside the political and practical obstacles to creating a national, government-run health plan in the U.S. Even Sanders's home state, famously agreeable to policies far left of the American mainstream, abandoned its attempt to form a single-payer system.

Everybody seems to agree that shrinking the number of insurers in the health-care system at least has the potential to save money by reducing overhead and paperwork. Consolidation also gives insurers more bargaining power to negotiate with doctors and hospitals, which have been on their own merger streak in recent years. Single-payer proponents say letting the government negotiate (or, more likely, dictate) prices would save billions in hospital, doctor, and drug spending.

Bernie Sanders and the leaders of the health insurance industry that he would abolish agree on more than you might think.

Reason #1 to Vote Bernie: Sanders Does 'Better Than Clinton' Against GOP in Swing States // HuffPo // H.A. Goodman - July 24, 2015

According to a July 22, 2015 Quinippiac University Poll, Hillary Clinton's once overwhelming lead in public opinion has been cut substantially, and it's still a long way to the February 1, 2016 Iowa Caucus. In states that will decide the 2016 presidential election, Quinippiac reports that "Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, runs as well as, or better than Clinton against Rubio, Bush and Walker." According to its latest poll, Quinippiac explains how Clinton's lead has eroded in swing states, while Sanders's surge has spread from Iowa and New Hampshire to other key regions:

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is behind or on the wrong side of a too-close-to-call result in matchups with three leading Republican contenders, U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker in Colorado, Iowa and Virginia, according to a Quinnipiac University Swing State Poll released today...

In several matchups in Iowa and Colorado, another Democratic contender, U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, runs as well as, or better than Clinton against Rubio, Bush and Walker...

Colorado voters say 62 - 34 percent that Hillary Clinton is not honest and trustworthy; 52 - 46 percent that she has strong leadership qualities and 57 - 39 percent that she does not care about their needs and problems...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Hillary Clinton's numbers have dropped among voters in the key swing states of Colorado, Iowa and Virginia. She has lost ground in the horserace and on key questions about her honesty and leadership," said Peter A. Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Poll. "On being a strong leader, a key metric in presidential campaigns, she has dropped four to 10 points depending on the state and she is barely above 50 percent in each of the three states."

In addition, it's important to remember that Clinton already finished third in the 2008 Iowa Caucus to Obama and John Edwards. Therefore, a precedent exists of Clinton's name recognition and political prowess giving way to a relative unknown who electrifies the masses; Sanders is filling arenas for a reason, and it's a similar reason to what made Obama so unique in 2008. Also, it's important to note that the phrase "Hillary Clinton is not honest and trustworthy" is not merely a meme or Twitter message from a Bernie Sanders supporter. Quinnipiac used those words in its poll (around 1,200 voters in each state were polled) and voters in Colorado, Iowa, and Virginia expressed that Clinton's trust issues will be a key factor in 2016.

It's believed by some people that Clinton is the only way for Democrats to win the White House. However, this mentality ignores the key issue of trust and how this sentiment will decide the presidential election. For example, Quinnipiac states that, "For 38 percent of Ohio voters, honesty is the top quality in a candidate." The belief system stating only Clinton can beat a GOP challenger also ignores the recent finding from Quinippiac that reads, "In several matchups in Iowa and Colorado, another Democratic contender, U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, runs as well as, or better than Clinton against Rubio, Bush and Walker."

Furthermore, the number one reason for Democrats to vote for Bernie Sanders in 2016 is that swing states are already moving away from Clinton (in search of more honest candidates like Sanders) and Election Day is just over 470 days away. If Bernie Sanders has gone from an impossibility, to drawing crowds of thousands, and now running "as well as, or better than Clinton against Rubio, Bush, and Walker," then imagine the political world 470 days from now.

The political paradigm within the Democratic Party is changing, and grass roots campaigning from organizations like Bernie 2016 TV, Feel The Bern TV ,Black Women 4 Bernie, Blacks for Bernie, Latinos for Bernie, Veterans for Bernie 2016 and American veterans across the country, has made such a shift become reality. Billions in campaign donations simply can't buy a person's trust. Name recognition can at times be beneficial, but not when The New York Times and Washington Post are focused on emails and foreign donor controversies.

Also, even before the recent Quinnipiac Poll, CNN published an article on June 17th titled Poll: Clinton's honesty and trustworthy problem extends to swing states, explaining the issue of trustworthiness in key states like Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania:

(CNN)A majority of voters in three key presidential swing states view Hillary Clinton as not honest and trustworthy, according to a new poll out Wednesday...

In Florida, 51% of voters hold the negative view of Clinton, compared to 43% who feel she is trustworthy. In Ohio, 53% of voters find Clinton not trustworthy, compared to 40% who do. And in Pennsylvania, 54% of voters don't find her honest, while 40% do.

Clinton's early state honest and trustworthy numbers follow what a CNN/ORC poll released earlier this month found: 42% of Americans consider her honest and trustworthy, while 57% don't.

Again, these findings aren't politically motivated diatribes from Democrats longing for change within the Democratic Party or GOP pundits on Fox. In terms of impact on the next election, Florida, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Colorado, Virginia, and Iowa combined have 95 Electoral Votes. The 2016 Democratic nominee needs to win these 95 Electoral Votes, not be defending against a criminal inquiry regarding emails.

Interestingly, while CNN writes "The Clinton campaign has said that they don't view public polling as reliable," the primary justification for Hillary Clinton supporters has always been an enormous lead within earlier polls. With this lead dwindling, and Bernie Sanders surging in some states and polling "as well as, or better than Clinton against Rubio, Bush and Walker," it will be interesting to see how the Clinton campaign responds to a rapidly changing political environment. Pretty soon, it's likely that the new talking point about Sanders running as a Democrat (after being an Interdependent for years) will be greatly overshadowed by the fact swing states are looking for honesty, not necessarily the letter "D" associated with a person's name.

As far as party affiliation, the Democratic nominee for president will have to earn the African-American vote in 2016, within swing states and through the nation. This is an important and welcomed paradigm shift, and one that will be tough for Clinton, especially after a controversial 3 AM television advertisement (targeting Obama in 2008) and a curious three week delay in addressing Ferguson. While Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley showed up at the recent Netroots Nation event and spoke to Black Lives Matter advocates, Chris Weigant is correct to ask, Where Was Hillary?

The issues presented at Netroots by Black Lives Matter must be addressed by the next Democratic nominee, and I firmly believe Bernie Sanders will rise to the occasion. In addition to winning swing states, the next Democratic nominee will have to win the trust of African-American voters. This will be crucial, especially when the Sandra Bland tragedy has brought racism to the forefront of American politics in 2015.

Ultimately, in terms of trust, nobody has ever accused Bernie Sanders of being untrustworthy; in fact his honesty at times has been seen as a political liability. If polls had once convinced some voters that Sanders couldn't win, these same polls should now illuminate a rapidly changing political evolution in key swing states. Quinnipiac recently stated "Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is behind or on the wrong side of a too-close-to-call result in matchups with three leading Republican contenders." Those words, as well as the finding that "U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, runs as well as, or better than Clinton against Rubio, Bush and Walker," should be the number one reason to vote for the Vermont Senator in 2016.

Bernie Sanders' Appeal Has Doubled Among Americans Since March // HuffPo // Janie Velencia - July 24, 2015

Americans' views of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) have grown more favorable as they continue to learn more about him, according to a new Gallup poll.

Sanders' "favorable" rating has doubled since March, jumping from 12 percent to 24 percent. Gallup notes that his rise in favorability can be attributed to Americans' increasing familiarity with him as he campaigns against former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination.

In March, only 24 percent of Americans were able to give an opinion on Sanders. Today, 44 percent say they are able to rate him. Sanders' increased visibility has caused his unfavorability quotient to go up as well: 20 percent of Americans now rate him unfavorably, compared to just 8 percent in March. Still, he remains the only Democratic candidate to have a net positive "favorable" rating, meaning that more people like him than dislike him.

At the same time, Americans' feelings toward Clinton have grown slightly less positive, dropping 5 percentage points since April. This latest poll marks Clinton's lowest net "favorable" score since 2007.

Sanders' recent surge still leaves him considerably behind Clinton, who has a 43 percent "favorable" rating compared to Sanders' 24 percent. Clinton also remains the most identifiable Democratic candidate. Eighty-nine percent of Americans are able to rate Clinton, while only 44 percent are able to rate Sanders.

Nearly 40 percent of Democrats and independents who lean toward the Democratic Party have a favorable view of Sanders. By contrast, 3 in 4 Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents have a favorable view of Clinton.

According to HuffPost Pollster, which aggregates all publicly available poll results, 18 percent of Democrats currently support Sanders, while 57 percent support Clinton. Sanders is, however, doing slightly better in primary states.

De Blasio gushes about 'democratic socialist' Bernie Sanders, says Donald Trump rallies people to 'blame immigrants' // NY Daily News // John Spina and Jennifer Fermino - July 24, 2015

Mayor de Blasio likes a lot of things about presidential contender Bernie Sanders — especially his “democratic socialist” designation.

"Bernie Sanders has done an extraordinary job talking about where we need to go in the country,” the mayor gushed in an interview on CNN on Friday.

When the network’s anchor Carol Costello asked de Blasio if he is s a “socialist” like Sanders — a Democratic senator from Vermont — De Blasio quickly corrected her to say that Sanders is a “Democratic socialist.”

He said he liked the sound of that.

“I think there's a lot to like in that title,” he said adding, “He [Sanders] has offered a critique of what's wrong that is very powerful. He has offered a set of ideas about the changes we need to make. And it's helping to drive the national discussion.”

Sanders’ role in the 2016 race is an important one, no matter what the outcome, de Blasio said.

“Some candidates that don't prevail still have a very big impact on the debate. I think right now he's playing a productive role,” he said.

He was more cautious when discussing Hillary Clinton.

De Blasio was also critical of Donald Trump (pictured), saying that he ‘tries to whip people up and blame immigrants as the root of the problem.’

“When I look at what she said [on issues like income inequality] I was encouraged,” he said.

“What I would like to see and what I think a lot of Democrats ... would like to see, is a clear road map to those changes."

The mayor also analyzed Republican Donald Trump’s standing in the polls — saying his popularity stems from him people’s unhappiness with the economy — which has led them to scapegoat immigrants.

“I think there is a subset of the American people that are very frustrated about some of the reality we face, and unfortunately try to blame immigrants, who are not the root of the problem," he said.

He added, "Unfortunately, someone like Trump tries to whip people up and blame immigrants as the root of the problem. They're not the problem."

Although many elected officials have called for the city to sever its business dealings with Trump because of his caustic comments, de Blasio said that seems unlikely - but they'll try.

"I don't think from what we've seen so far there is a construct to get out of those contacts, but we will certainly look for every option," the mayor said.

A closer look at an old Bernie Sanders talking point // PolitiFact // Louis Jacobson - July 24, 2015

As Sen. Bernie Sanders has begun to make waves in the Democratic presidential primary field, an old quote by the Vermont senator has been making the rounds on social media.

"A two-income family today has less disposable income than a one-income family had 30 years ago," Sanders said, according to a post on Reddit that links to an undated video of Sanders addressing a California Democratic Party convention. The claim was sufficiently intriguing that three readers independently emailed PolitiFact to ask whether it was accurate.

We found several examples of Sanders saying this, or something close to it. He used the line in a 2007 op-ed in the Huffington Post, in a lengthy and high-profile Senate floor speech in 2010, in the 2011 book version of that speech, and in the California Democratic Party address from that video, which, we determined, occurred in 2011.

When we checked with Sanders' staff, however, they said he doesn't use this talking point any more, and indeed, we couldn't find examples of him using it after 2011. For this reason, we won't put the claim to the Truth-O-Meter. Still, because the claim was interesting to us, and because it was clearly of interest to some of our readers, we decided to take a closer look at its origins and accuracy.

Is something off here?

We first turned to Census Bureau data (table F-12 here, to be specific) that measures median income for families by the number of earners in the family. The figures are adjusted for inflation.

We found that the median income for a one-earner family in 1983 was $43,144. For a two-earner family in 2013, the median income was $87,997. That's quite a bit higher -- more than double, in fact, in inflation-adjusted dollars -- but that's total income.

What about "disposable income"?

Economists define disposable income as income minus taxes. We did our own estimate of how much of a bite taxes took out of incomes in both 1983 and 2013 by looking at inflation-adjusted data from the Commerce Department's Bureau of Economic Analysis. As it turns out, BEA data shows that disposable income accounted for about 88 percent of personal income in both 1983 and 2013. (This is a total figure, of course; individual results may vary.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Using this data, we calculated that 88 percent of one-earner family income in 1982 was $37,967, while 88 percent of two-earner family income in 2013 was $77,420. That, too, is more than double -- a far cry from being less, as Sanders said.

So what's going on?

Disposable vs. discretionary

A big part of the problem is that Sanders was using the word "disposable" when he should have said "discretionary." This is a common mistake -- both words start with "d," after all -- but one that has significant consequences for the claim's accuracy.

Unlike disposable income, discretionary income doesn't have a widely accepted definition. Generally, it means disposable income minus expenses that are necessary to maintain a decent standard of living. Housing and food would likely be included, and you could make a good case for clothing, health insurance and a motor vehicle.

But there's no official list and lots of room for disagreement about how much to allow as a reasonable cost burden for such items. Own a home or rent? Whole Foods or Walmart? New or used car? Low- or high-deductible health insurance? And that doesn't even take into account geography; certain areas of the United States have much higher or lower costs of living.

Brookings Institution economist Gary Burtless noted that unlike taxes, which must be paid under law, the necessity of everything else is more flexible.

"Nearly everyone needs shelter, but relatively few of us are obliged to spend 40 percent or more of our income to obtain a minimally decent place to live," Burtless said. "Just because people spend a huge fraction of their income to live in a bigger house or a more expensive neighborhood does not mean they face a mandate to pay so much for their housing. There are usually less expensive alternatives."

Tara Sinclair, a George Washington University economist, added that the structure of households has changed over time. "Families are smaller, and two-earner households are more likely among the higher educated who are more likely to get married," she said. "So the numbers are slippery."

The Warren connection

As it turns out, we were able to locate what may be the methodology that produced Sanders' (former) talking point. Interestingly, the source may have been Sanders' fellow Senate progressive icon -- Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass. -- and, even stranger, it emerged long before either politician ended up in the Senate.

The comparison appears to have come from a passage in Warren's 2003 book, The Two-Income Trap, co-authored with her daughter, Amelia Warren Tyagi. It compares two families, one in the 1970s and one around 2002. Each has a mom, a dad, and two kids. In the 1970s, the mom stayed at home; in 2002, she was working, so the 2002 figures included costs for a second car and day care, plus taxes for a higher tax bracket. All figures were inflation-adjusted and were drawn from median figures for each category.

The 1970s family, by the Warren calculation, earned $38,700 in income from the father, and had to pay $5,310 in annual mortgage costs for an average home in an average neighborhood; $5,140 in vehicle costs; $1,030 for health insurance; and income taxes of $9,386 at the 24 percent tax bracket.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That leaves $17,834, or about $1,500 per month in "discretionary income" for all other expenses, including food, clothing and utilities.

As for the 2002 family, the working parents' combined income was $67,800. Costs included $9,000 for the mortgage, $8,000 in car expenses, $1,650 for health insurance; $9,670 for day care; and $22,435 in income taxes in the 33 percent tax bracket.

That leaves $17,045. Under this model, then, the two-working-parent family in 2002 earned $789 less than the 1970s one-earner family. That's not a big decline -- about 4 percent in inflation-adjusted dollars over the course of close to 30 years -- but the family certainly isn't gaining ground.

Still, there are a couple of things worth pointing out, beyond the fact that Sanders chose the wrong "d" word to describe what he was talking about.

First, Sanders was using this statistic as late as 2011, almost a decade after it was first calculated. That's a long time for a statistic of this sort to remain unchanged.

Second, George Mason University professor Todd J. Zywicki noted in the Wall Street Journal in 2007 that the biggest increase in Warren's comparison comes from a higher tax burden -- not from the rising cost of housing, vehicles, health insurance and day care. In fact, taxes were 2.4 times higher for the 2002 family. Each of the other items saw significant increases, but none more than doubled, as taxes did. Yet complaints about taxes holding back working families are usually a talking point for conservatives, not for progressives like Sanders.

A new talking point

At least Sanders appears to have settled on a more accurate talking point.

When we checked with his staff, they said Sanders' usual line today is this: "Since 1999, the typical middle-class family has seen its income go down by almost $5,000 after adjusting for inflation. Incredibly, that family earned less income last year than it did 26 years ago – back in 1989."

His staff pointed to Table A-1 of the Census Bureau report on Income and Poverty in the U.S., released in 2014.

The report found that in 2013, median income was $51,939. That compares to a real median income of $56,895 in 1999, and a real median income of $52,432 in 1989. This data, we confirmed, checks out.

Even here, though, there's more than meets the eye, Burtless said.

Burtless noted that in 1989, there were 2.65 Americans per household, while in 2013, there were 2.55. "It's a small matter, but it means that the median income per person in the median family increased about 3 percent over that period even though the median income of households fell by 1 percent," he said.

The moral of the story: When it comes to documenting economic stagnation experienced by the middle class, it's complicated.

Draft Biden campaign ramps up // LA Times // Michael Memoli - July 24, 2015

Vice President Joe Biden may still be weeks away from deciding whether to join the 2016 presidential race, but a group seeking to nudge him off the fence is ramping up its push.

Draft Biden 2016 is holding a "National Day of Action" on Saturday with 20 events across the country, a potential sign of whether there is appetite for more candidates -- and this candidate specifically -- in the Democratic field. The group's executive director will be speaking in New York, while other events are planned in early nominating states like New Hampshire and South Carolina, and five in California alone.

On Friday, the group also launched its first video on YouTube -- icalled "Ridin' with Biden" -- seeking to gin up support for the idea. It's hardly the most polished video, but it features unnamed advocates touting his credentials on LGBT rights and his work to stop domestic violence.

The Chicago-based group says it has gathered 150,000 signatures for its petition to encourage Biden to enter the race.

Biden has said little publicly about the possibility of making a third presidential run since the death of his eldest son, Beau, in late May. A final decision could come in September.

Draft Biden group ramps up outreach // The Hill // Jonathan Easley - July 24, 2015

The super-PAC organized to encourage Vice President Biden to run for president released its first ad on Friday ahead of a “national day of action” to gather signatures for the push.

“Some people ask why Joe Biden,” a young man in the ad says. “I turn back and ask them why not Joe Biden? He’s been on of the most influential vice presidents that this country has seen. He’s right now a part of one of the most successful administrations in recent history, and he’s a big reason for that success.”

Supporters in the ad praise Biden for being on the forefront of the gay rights movement, for working to stop violence on college campuses and for generally appealing to “the younger generation’s beliefs.”

“In 2016 I’m ridin’ with Biden,” the supporters say.

Draft Biden said it wasn’t putting any money behind the ad, but was sending it to supporters and relying on grassroots support to promote it. The group is operated by William Pierce, who reportedly volunteered for Biden's 2008 presidential campaign.

Hillary Clinton remains the front-runner in the race for the Democratic nomination, but recent polling shows Biden would have an impact on the contest if he were to run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to a Monmouth University survey released earlier this month, Clinton takes 51 percent support nationally, followed by Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) at 17 percent and Biden at 13 percent.

But the poll found Biden's entrance would shake up the race.

In addition to Biden's 13 percent support, an additional 12 percent of Democratic voters said they'd be likely to support Biden if he took the plunge, and 31 percent said they'd be somewhat likely to support him.

Most of that additional support, 68 percent, would come from those who are currently Clinton supporters.

"Most people seem to be focusing on a Sanders surge among the liberal wing of the party," said Monmouth polling director Patrick Murray. "But the bigger threat to Clinton may come from a Biden candidacy, where the two would be fighting for the same voters."

Rival bets Biden will run for president // The Hill // Jesse Byrnes - July 24, 2015

Presidential hopeful Lincoln Chafee is predicting that Vice President Biden will launch a bid for the White House.

"I think he's going to get in," Chafee, a former Rhode Island governor and long-shot candidate for the Democratic nomination, said during an interview with Larry King on his Ora.tv show "PoliticKING."

"I see him standing with President Obama in every photo. Especially the big main profile [photos] — when the Supreme Court ruled in favor the Affordable Care Act, the deal with Iran, the opening of Cuba — it always seems the vice president is standing right there," Chafee said.

"That seems to signal something to me."

Biden visited Colorado and California this week for a series of speeches on the economy, part of his ramped up schedule in the weeks following the death of his eldest son, Beau, 46, to brain cancer.

Speculation that Biden will enter the race and challenge Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, has ticked up in the past few weeks, starting with a report that his two sons had urged him to run.

Two more reports in the past couple weeks have suggested that Biden is still mulling a bid, though a spokesperson has repeatedly said that such speculation "is premature and inappropriate."

"He's run before — he ran in 1988 and of course in 2008," said Chafee, who was a senator before being elected governor.

"And I served with him on the Foreign Relations Committee, we've traveled together to Iraq and done some trips together to Mexico. I'll put my two dollars that he gets in," he added.

Clinton holds a major lead against Democratic rivals including Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and Chafee.

However, a recent poll suggested that Biden could tighten the race, should he announce a bid.

Jeb Bush wants t o 'phase out' Medicare. Here's what he meant. // WaPo // Max Ehrenfreund - July 24, 2015

Democrats seized on a remark by Jeb Bush on Thursday, saying his comments on phasing out Medicare showed he was out of touch with senior citizens.

"We're not going to have adequate coverage for our children or our grandchildren without Medicare," a woman at a town hall in Gorham, N.H. told him, according to Politico's Eli Stokols. "It's not an entitlement. I earned that." (The average female worker born in 1945 will take $521,000 in benefits over her lifetime, having paid $374,000 into the system in taxes.)

"It's an actuarially unsound system," the former Florida governor replied.

"The people that are receiving these benefits, I don't think that we should touch that," Bush went on to say. "We need to figure out a way to phase out this program for others and move to a new system that allows them to have something, because they're not going to have anything."

At The Week, Ryan Cooper notes that MSNBC's Steve Benen writes that cost projections for Medicare are less dire than they were before President Obama's health care reform took effect, and The Week's Ryan Cooper argues the problem isn't with Medicare, but with this country's exceptionally expensive health care system.

A spokesman tells Bloomberg's Michael C. Bender that Bush didn't mean he believes Medicare should be scrapped entirely. Instead, Bush wants to raise the retirement age and force wealthier beneficiaries to pay more. If he were elected, Republicans in Congress might send him something similar to the proposal from Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), who converts Medicare into a voucher system.

As Vox's Matthew Yglesias notes, Bush is making a distinction without much of a difference. Adding a means test to a program that has always been a universal benefit, or giving the elderly vouchers for health insurance, would alter Medicare's fundamental character. It would hardly be the same program.

Jeb Bush now says he wouldn't 'phase out' Medicare. What he would do is just as wrong. // WaPo // Paul Waldman - July 24, 2015

It had to happen sooner or later: a Republican presidential candidate says something suggesting he'd destroy Medicare, the Democrats jump all over him, and he backtracks, saying that's not what he meant and in fact he only wants to strengthen it. This time it's Jeb Bush, who said the other day that though we can keep Medicare around for the people who are currently on it, "we need to figure out a way to phase out this program for others and move to a new system that allows them to have something – because they're not going to have anything."

This is an old argument from Republicans, one they also use to justify attacks on Social Security: the program is doomed anyway, so we should go ahead and privatize it. The argument is completely wrong with regard to Social Security, and the truth about Medicare is that the program's future is looking brighter and brighter — in no small part because of the Affordable Care Act. The argument Bush is making is ten years out of date.

Bush did try to walk back his statement a bit, saying the "phase out" part was taken out of context and he's only talking about how we "reform our entitlement system." Here's his follow-up, which doesn't change the essence of what he was arguing:

"It's an actuarially unsound health care system," said Bush, who said something must be done before the system burdens future generations with $50 billion of debt. "Social Security is an underfunded retirement system; people have put money into it, for sure.

"The people that are receiving these benefits, I don't think that we should touch that; but your children and grandchildren are not going to get the benefit of this that they believe they're going to get, or that you think they're going to get, because the amount of money put in compared to the amount of money the system costs is wrong."

Bush hasn't yet released his plan to phase out/reform Medicare, but given these comments it seems likely he'll embrace something like what Paul Ryan has been advocating for years. It involves changing Medicare from a guaranteed single-payer government insurance plan into a voucher plan, in which the government gives senior citizens a set amount of money with which they can go out and get private health insurance. It saves money by limiting the value of that voucher, so if it's less than what coverage actually costs, well, tough luck. In that way, it eliminates the central promise of Medicare, which is that every American senior citizen will have health coverage.

We'll await Jeb's particulars, but I promise you that most of the GOP candidates will embrace some version of this plan, because that's what the Republican consensus on Medicare is these days. And it's always justified with the argument Jeb gives: because of skyrocketing costs the program is doomed, so privatization is the only way to make sure it's there for your kids. But don't worry, current seniors, we won't touch your Medicare! Which is one of the ironies of their argument: the free market is supposed to make everything wonderful, but they fall all over themselves to promise senior citizens that they won't disturb the big-government, socialist program that seniors love.

Now on to the cost question. As it happens, the Medicare Trustees just released their annual report on the future of the program. And as Kevin Drum noted, things are looking a lot sunnier than they were a few years ago:

Ten years ago, Medicare was a runaway freight train. Spending was projected to increase indefinitely, rising to 13 percent of GDP by 2080. This year, spending is projected to slow down around 2040, and reaches only 6 percent of GDP by 2090. Six percent! That's half what we thought a mere decade ago. If that isn't spectacular, I don't know what is.

Those are projections for what's going to happen decades from now, so things are doubtless going to change. But the presumption of the Republican argument is that Medicare is eventually going to eat the entire federal budget, and so we have no choice but to fundamentally alter it. And that's just not true.

The other assumption they make is that the way to alter Medicare is simple: privatize it. But they're wrong about this, too. Medicare is expensive, but that's not because it's an inefficient big-government program. In fact, Medicare is remarkably efficient, more so than private insurance. That's because it benefits from economies of scale, and because it doesn't have to spend money on things like marketing, underwriting, and big salaries for executives. The reason Medicare is expensive is that American health care is expensive, and it serves a lot of people. The retirement of the large Baby Boom generation is what's producing its current funding challenges.

Let's not forget that at the same time Republicans cry that Medicare is unaffordable and so must be dismantled, they fight any effort to actually lower costs in a rational way. For instance, they're adamantly opposed to comparative effectiveness research, which involves looking at competing treatments and seeing which ones actually work better. That this isn't something Medicare already takes into account sounds ridiculous, but it's true. If there are two medications for a particular ailment that are equally effective, but one costs $100 a year and one costs $100,000 a year, wouldn't it make sense for Medicare to 1) find that out, and 2) make coverage decisions accordingly? But Republicans have said no — Medicare should just pay for both, no matter what it costs.

Republicans also oppose the most significant effort to reduce Medicare costs in decades, something called the Affordable Care Act, which included all kinds of provisions meant to achieve this goal. Perhaps most critically, the law starts a move away from the fee-for-service model, in which doctors and hospitals make more money the more procedures they do, to a model where they get paid a single rate for treating a patient. Under the fee-for-service model, if your hospital screws up, you get an infection, and you have to get re-admitted, they make more money; the ACA actually punishes them for that, giving them a greater incentive to provide better and less expensive care.

But Republicans not only want to repeal the ACA, which means repealing all those kinds of payment provisions, they have nothing much to say about how, specifically, we might save money in Medicare. Their only answer is that if we privatize it, the magic of the market will produce savings. Of course, if that were true America would have the cheapest health care system in the advanced world, since ours is already more private than in any other similar country. And yet we don't — ours is far and away the most expensive, and that's precisely because the market has failed.

So to sum up, this is the Republican argument on Medicare: We absolutely can't do anything in particular that would bring down the cost of Medicare, but the cost of Medicare is so outrageous that we have no choice but to privatize it.

When Jeb Bush and the other candidates talk about this subject, pay close attention to what they say. They'll use the word "strengthen" a lot — we want to strengthen Medicare! They'll tell seniors, who vote in great numbers, that they aren't going to touch their precious Medicare. And they'll ignore what we've learned in the last few years, talking as though things look just as bad as they did before the Affordable Care Act was passed and health care spending slowed. But the truth is that their solution is no solution at all.

Bush's strategy: Run as the un-Trump // WaPo // Ben Terris - July 24, 2015

As Donald Trump flew to the Mexico border — ensuring what he would probably call the biggest, classiest, most impressive headlines of the day — former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush was making a few superlative stops of his own: checking out the longest candy counter in the world, visiting the oldest ski store in the country and talking to a few dozen voters in the shadow of the largest mountain in New England.

It was decidedly lower-key campaigning, and Bush said he's okay with that.

"I'm the tortoise in the race," he told a gaggle of voters and media outside of Lahout's ski shop in Littleton, N.H. "Slow and steady progress each and every day."

This has been the New Hampshire mantra for Bush all along, and one he repeated a number of times on his five-stop tour through the North Country on Thursday. And he can't complain about the results at this early stage. While many of his opponents have been on a polling roller coaster here in the first-in-the-nation primary state, Bush has held steady. He's currently leading the pack at about 16 percent in the most recent surveys.

So when asked outside of the ski shop whether Trump was really just running to promote a new reality show called "Political Apprentice," Bush didn't take the bait.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think he’s a serious candidate and he’s going to have a lot of money,” he said. “He’s tapping into people’s angst, which is legitimate. But I don’t think you win by denigrating people, I don’t think you win by tearing us apart. You have to give concrete proposals that allow people to rise up”

Over his two days this week in New Hampshire — a state seen as central to his nomination hopes — Bush spent plenty of time talking about his own proposals. At an event for Americans for Prosperity, Bush didn’t seem afraid to stultify his audience with wonkery.

He knocked the Export-Import Bank, talked about the importance of the sharing economy, and said he was for simplifying the tax code. At a VFW he talked about the need to rebuild the nation’s military, and took questions from climate activists who were happy that he wanted to eliminate federal subsidies for fossil fuels, but displeased that he wanted to do the same for renewable engergy. He promised a woman at a town hall that he wouldn’t take away her guns, and got into an exchange with a woman angry that he wanted to “phase out” Medicare (he preferred to say “reform” Medicare).

He wasn't without some controversy. When asked whether Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley should have to apologize for saying "all lives matter," a perceived slight to the "Black Lives Matter" movement, Bush said "of course not."

"We're so uptight and so politically correct now that we apologize for saying 'lives matter?'" asked Bush.

The challenge here is the same one that's bedeviled his campaign from the start: how to paint himself as something new and fresh as a member of a political family that's long been familiar to New Hampshire voters. He uses words like “disruption” and talks about how great Uber is. He speaks in Spanish and talks about how Republicans cannot survive without reaching out to the Latino community. He told one voter that he supported term limits for Congress, because it’s important to get new blood into positions of power.

“The talent that exists in Florida’s legislature is better [because of it],” he said.

Of course, it’s not the easiest argument for Bush to make, since his name is synonymous with the past. It’s become a cliché, but that doesn’t make it any less true, that his surname is both his biggest asset and his biggest liability.

“I voted for Prescott, H.W., your brother, and possibly you,” Bill Remick, a former local politician, told Bush as he walked into the VFW.

“Possibly?” Bush’s communications director Tim Miller asked him. “What do we need to do? Why possibly?”

“Well, I just met him,” said Remick.

Jeb Bush Learns Perils of Medicare Overhaul Proposal // WSJ // Beth Reinhard - July 24, 2015

Jeb Bush learned Thursday that it’s still politically treacherous to talk about entitlement reform, even though an overhaul of Social Security and Medicare has become widely accepted in Republican circles.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At a forum Wednesday in Manchester, N.H., organized by Americans for Prosperity, a leading conservative group, Mr. Bush said he wanted to "phase out" Medicare in its current form for the entitlement program's future beneficiaries, while protecting it for people receiving benefits now.

He said: "I think a lot of people recognize that we need to make sure we fulfill the commitment to people that already received the benefits, that are receiving the benefits. But then we need to figure out a way to phase out this program for others and move to a new system that allows them to have something because they're not going to have anything."

On Thursday, Democratic and liberal groups circulated footage of Mr. Bush's comments in the hope of turning it into one of those widely shared moments from the campaign trail that goes viral and damages a candidate. "Save Granny," declared one email missive.

Proposing to revamp Medicare and Social Security has long been considered dangerous political turf because elderly people typically vote in large numbers. But over the last couple election cycles, as the tea party movement has sounded alarms about the national debt and as Wisconsin Rep. Paul Ryan's entitlement reform plan gained traction, proposals to protect benefits for today's seniors while overhauling the program for future beneficiaries has become commonplace among Republicans.

On Thursday, at a town hall meeting in Gorham, N.H., Mr. Bush was confronted about his Medicare plan.

"I paid into it to it for all these years just like all these other seniors here and now you want to take it away?" a woman asked, according to a video taken by a Democratic group, American Bridge. "Why are you always attacking the seniors?"

Mr. Bush called Medicare an "actuarially unsound healthcare system" and Social Security an "underfunded retirement system."

"The people that are receiving these benefits – I don't think we should touch that, but your children and grandchildren are not going to get the benefits that they believe they are going to get or that you think they're going to get," he said. "Whenever you get into a conversation about reforming entitlement the first thing that you can be guaranteed of is that the left will attack you and demonize you."

Liberals, Mr. Bush said, were taking his words "out of context."

Florida poll: Jeb Bush takes big lead over Marco Rubio // Politico // Marc Caputo - July 24, 2015

Jeb Bush holds a commanding lead over Sen. Marco Rubio among registered Florida Republicans, who have soured on the senator since he announced his presidential bid in April, a new poll shows.

In the crowded GOP field, Bush leads the second-place Rubio 28 to 16 percent in their home state, according to Mason Dixon Polling & Research's survey. In Mason-Dixon's poll three months ago, Rubio was essentially tied with Bush 31 to 30 percent.

Rubio's 15 percentage-point drop coincides with the rise of Gov. Scott Walker, who's now in third place with 13 percent – an 11 point increase for the Wisconsin governor since the April survey.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“And the center of the GOP political universe of late — Donald Trump — is in fourth with 11 percent,” Mason Dixon pollster Brad Coker said in a written analysis.

“This is the first Florida poll taken entirely since Trump’s remarks regarding John McCain’s Vietnam War service. His 11% showing in Florida is far below his support in recent national polls. This could be the result of the home state advantage of both Bush and Rubio,” Coker wrote. “However, the fact that Walker has slipped ahead of him may be a stronger sign that his candidacy is fading. Furthermore, there is a clear ceiling that Trump has among Florida Republicans. When asked if they are considering a vote for Trump, a large majority (58%) said they were not. Only 27% gave an indication that Trump was under their serious consideration.”

All the other Republican candidates are polling in the single digits.

The Democratic primary isn’t much of a race at all. Hillary Clinton leads Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders 58 to 17 percent. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley received just 2 percent support in the poll, with former Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb registering no support. In that primary, 23 percent are undecided.

In the more-contested GOP primary, 13 percent are undecided, a decrease of 4 points since April. Because the number of undecided voters didn’t shrink much while Rubio’s support plummeted, he could have lost voters to Walker and Trump, who wasn’t named in the last survey. Bush’s 2-point drop since April is statistically insignificant, indicating his support has essentially remained stable.

This is the second troubling poll for Rubio this week. On Sunday, a Bendixen & Amandi International poll of Republican voters in Miami-Dade County – Florida’s most populous and the home base of the two GOP frontrunners – showed Bush ahead of Rubio 35 to 25 percent. That poll was underwritten by The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald.

“Here’s what’s really shocking: Bush is leading Rubio 43 percent to 31 percent among Cuban-American Republicans in Miami-Dade,” pollster Fernand Amandi told POLITICO. “Marco is Cuban-American. Jeb isn’t. That’s a real serious problem for Rubio.”

The Bendixen & Amandi survey polled 250 Republicans in the county. Mason Dixon surveyed 500 statewide. Of the Mason-Dixon respondents, 64 were Hispanic and they supported Bush over Rubio 40 to 30 percent. In the last Mason-Dixon poll, Rubio was up 40 to 20 percent over Bush among Hispanics. Factoring in Bush’s rise and Rubio’s fall, the numbers indicate Hispanic support has shifted 32 percentage points in Bush’s favor. Coker cautioned that the margin of error for this sub-sample was high, 13 percent. The overall error-margin for the statewide poll is 4 percent.

Bush’s support among Florida, Miami-Dade and Hispanic Republicans isn’t too surprising because, as a former popular governor, he has strong name ID and broad support among financial and political leaders in the state. The bilingual Bush has remained a sought-after figure on the campaign trail for Florida Republicans for years, thereby keeping his name in circulation.

Bush also leads Rubio and all others in the Sunshine State money race. Of the $11.4 million in campaign contributions Bush received in the just-ended quarter, $2.6 million came from Florida. Rubio raised a total of $8.9 million, $1.9 million of which came from Florida. Rubio has more money in his campaign bank account, but Jeb has far more financial support from now-independent third-party political committees. In total dollars raised between the committees and the campaigns, Bush leads Rubio $119 million to $45.2 million.

While Rubio has kept a relatively low profile since his announcement, Bush began barnstorming early states after he officially entered the race in mid-June. Unlike Rubio, Bush has numerous well-publicized town-hall events and frequently takes questions from scrums of reporters and voters. Bush has also established himself as the anti-Trump after the New York billionaire (a part-time Florida resident) made disparaging remarks about illegal Mexican immigrants and Bush's wife, the Mexican-born Columba Bush.

Bush's advantage in money and popularity are no surprise to Rubio's top supporters, who have deftly tried to set low expectations compared to the elder former governor. Rubio has enough money to survive and even thrive. And all sides know the race will change.

And it's only July, 2015. Florida's winner take-all primary is March 15.

Jeb Bush's Struggle to Say What He Means Continues // Bloomberg // Michael C. Bender - July 24, 2015

During a forum sponsored by Americans for Prosperity, the influential conservative group backed by David and Charles Koch, Jeb Bush told the audience that he wants to "phase out" Medicare.

Afterwards, the former Florida governor was approached by an environmental activist, who was momentarily excited when Bush used the same language to say he preferred to "phase out" tax credits for energy companies.

Neither of those positions are quite what they seem.

While eliminating tax credits might sound great to liberal environmentalists and Tea Party Republicans focused on "crony capitalism," many of the breaks for Big Oil aren't technically tax credits.

On Medicaid, Bush's team complained that Democrats were taking him out of context, an increasingly frequent objection from the candidate who is billing himself as the most experienced and most thoughtful on the trail.

The protest from Bush's camp has been justified, to be sure. Democrats, including presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, leaned a bit too far over their skis recently when they suggested that a component of Bush's economic plan was that Americans should work harder. What Bush said was that he wanted to find more full-time job opportunities for part-time workers. And while the economic reality of that happening is somewhat dubious, the attacks gained some traction and the spin found its way into town-hall questions Bush has faced on the campaign trail.

Similarly, Bush was confronted Thursday in Gorham, New Hampshire, about his Medicare comments. "Why are you always attacking the seniors?," an unidentified woman (and possible liberal activist) asked Bush.

"It's an actuarially unsound health care system," said Bush, adding that he's not attacking seniors, according to a Politico report from the event. "The people that are receiving these benefits, I don't think that we should touch that. But your children and grandchildren are not going to get the benefit of this...because the amount of money put in compared to the amount of money the system costs is wrong."

How it started

Bush takes as many questions, if not more, than other candidates. The strategy is a double-sided sword: His candidness often earns him support from crowds and favorable stories in the media, but also one that can also lead to more confusion than clarity, and reinforce one of his biggest problems on the trail.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The source of the dispute on Medicare is somewhat ironic. Speaking about the issue on Wednesday, Bush was bemoaning the politics of the issue, recalling the 2011 digital ad from the liberal group Agenda Project that showed a Paul Ryan lookalike wheeling an elderly woman off a cliff. The ad was in response to the Wisconsin Republican's plan to end fee-for-service Medicare for people 55-and-under, and replace it with subsidies for people to buy either a private plan or a government-provided plan.

Bush, whose home state has the highest percentage of seniors in the nation, then went on to say that Americans generally agree that, while current benefits should be protected for those receiving them, the Medicare system needs to be reformed. And here's where he gets himself into trouble.

"We need to figure out a way to phase out this program for others, and move to a new system that allows them to have something, because they're not going to have anything," Bush told his Manchester audience.

"A massive blunder on Jeb Bush's part," U.S. Representative Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Florida, head of the Democratic National Committee, said Thursday on a conference call with reporters. "Maybe Jeb Bush can afford to get by without Medicare—I'm sure the Koch brothers would be fine, too—but millions of Americans count on Medicare when they retire for access to quality, affordable health care."

Bush's team had a different interpretation. Bush never said he wanted to replace Medicare, spokesman Tim Miller argued, adding that the former governor was referring to the changes he's been talking about for months on the campaign trail, such as increasing the retirement age and means testing to make wealthier Americans pay more. "It's an obvious attempt to take him out of context," Miller said.

While Miller's irritation was somewhat justified a few weeks ago, here the trouble is of Bush's own causing. The "new program" he was talking about may well have been Medicare with more means testing, and a higher retirement age. But that language is at best imprecise, particularly for a debate, as Bush himself noted, that easily can be distorted.

Medicare and oil

While Bush hasn't released specifics about his own Medicare plan, an often-mentioned change would raise the eligibility age from 65 to 67. The effect of that change would reduce the budget deficit—projected to increase to about $1 trillion over 10 years—by about $19 billion during that time, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office. A report from the Kaiser Family Foundation notes that such a move may also increase premiums on both the young and old.

Bush also hasn't been specific about exactly what he means by means testing, a concept that is so popular its been approved several times by Congress. The Medicare Modernization Act, enacted in 2003, increased premiums on individuals earning more than $85,000 a year. High-earners shouldered more of the Medicare burden under Obamacare, and again this year under a bipartisan plan to maintain reimbursements to Medicare doctors.

After the event in Manchester, Bush was approached by an activist tied to 350 Action, a New York-based environmental group, who wanted to know what Bush was going to do about tax breaks for big oil. Oil tycoons Richard Kinder, Ray Lee Hunt, Jeffery Hildebrand, Trevor Rees-Jones, and T. Boone Pickens all donated to Bush’s campaign, according to disclosures.

Bush, to the activists surprise, said he wanted to eliminate them all. But smile soon faded as Bush explained what he meant by "all."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We should phase out, through tax reform, the tax credits for wind, for solar, for the oil and gas sector, for all this stuff," Bush said, adding that "the best way" was to "let markets decide this."

When the activist protested about cutting subsidies for renewable energy, Bush pounced. "You want to pick winners and losers," the Republican said. "I don't think we should pick winners and losers. Tax reform ought to be to lower the rate as far you can, and eliminate as many of these subsidies; All of the things that impede the ability in a more dynamic way to get to where we need to get, which is low cost energy that is respectful of the environment."

The problem here is, again, one of definitions.

Bush hasn't been very specific yet about what he wants to do with the tax code. But when he talks about eliminating "credits" for energy, that's likely to have a disproportionate effect on renewable sources.

Solar and wind energy producers get their tax benefits in the form of tax credits. Oil and gas producers typically don't, instead enjoying faster write-offs, deductions and some favorable accounting rules that aren't "credits."

Bush but no Trump expected at Aug. 3 Republican forum // Reuters // Steve Holland - July 24, 2015

A Republican forum on Aug. 3 in New Hampshire is growing in significance as 14 candidates have now agreed to participate.

The Voters First Republican Presidential Forum was set up to accommodate candidates who were not ranked in the top 10 in national polling and who are to compete in the first official Republican debate, moderated by Fox News on Aug. 6 in Cleveland.

But now many in the top 10 are planning to show up for the New Hampshire forum as well. New York real estate mogul Donald Trump is not attending, the Union Leader newspaper of Manchester, New Hampshire, reported.

The Voters First Republican Presidential Forum is to be held at St. Anselm College in Manchester.

The two-hour forum is intended to highlight the importance of New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary, along with the nominating contests in Iowa and South Carolina.

The Union Leader, one of the sponsors for the forum, said the candidates who have committed to attend include Jeb Bush, Scott Walker, Rand Paul, Marco Rubio, Carly Fiorina, Bobby Jindal, John Kasich and Chris Christie.

Also on the list are Rick Perry, George Pataki, Lindsey Graham, Ted Cruz, Rick Santorum and Ben Carson.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush sent a produced video, featuring two anti-abortion activists and his own remarks. In the video, recently uploaded by Bush's campaign under the title "Defending Life," Mark Merrill, a Tampa-based radio host and author of "All Pro Dad," vouches for Bush. "He stands strongly for life," says Merrill.

Bush and Merrill go back a long way, most notably when Merrill chaired a commission under then-Gov. Bush devoted to "Building Florida's Families," chiefly by focusing on marriage promotion. These days, Merrill's Twitter profile says he is "sharing parenting, marriage & relational truth," often through popular blog posts.

For Merrill, that truth is fairly gendered. His advice for fathers to their daughters:

"Be a Lady." Teach her to be a lady in the way she dresses. Girls can be modest and still be trendy. It means to use lady-like language…crassness and cussing are very unattractive. It means to use good manners. It means to draw physical boundaries and let men know that her body is reserved exclusively for her future husband.

There's a pretty stark divide between the advice Merrill offers to husbands and wives. For example, "Filling the 4 Chambers of Your Husband's Heart" counsels, "We also want our wives to validate our manliness. A man wants to be a hero to his wife." The counterpart directed at men says, "Cherishing and safeguarding her physically and emotionally leads to her being protected."

Some of Merrill's advice goes both ways for men and women. In one post, he advises spouses to "stop flaunting your body to others. This applies to men and women. Our culture does not value modesty, and when you flaunt your features, it appears you're advertising yourself or are available to others. Dress like you're only available to one person, your spouse. Because that's the only person you should be available to."

A representative for the Bush campaign didn't immediately respond to a request for comment on Merrill's role in the campaign.

Jeb Bush doubles down on far-right Medicare 'reform' // MSNBC // Steve Benen - July 24, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Jeb Bush caused a stir Wednesday night, telling a Koch-backed political group that he wants to "phase out" Medicare entirely. At a town-hall event in New Hampshire yesterday, an unhappy voter asked for an explanation. Here's what the former Florida governor said in response:

"To my point last night, here's what I said. I said, first and foremost, whenever you get into a conversation about reforming entitlements, the first thing that you can be guaranteed of is that the left will attack you and demonize you. It took about six hours for that to happen [on Wednesday night]. I woke up in the morning and words taken out of context – exactly what I predicted would happen.

"I told the story of Paul Ryan who had a plan to deal with this over the long haul. The first thing I saw, that happened to him was, a guy looking like Paul Ryan was in a TV ad attacking him, wearing a red tie and a suit, throwing granny off the cliff.

"This is, we've got to get beyond this, because this is not a sustainable system. We need to protect it for people that have it, and we need to make sure that we reform it for people that are expecting it."

He then transitioned to talking about the latest report from the Medicare trustees, which was released this week, and which Bush seems to believe bolsters his argument.

I didn't really intend to return to the subject – here's yesterday's piece if you missed it – but so long as the GOP candidate is doubling down on a poor argument, it's probably worth clarifying further why Bush is mistaken.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush is concerned, for example, about being “attacked” and “demonized.” I don’t imagine it’s fun being a candidate facing irate voters, but when those seeking public office talk about giving tax cuts to millionaires while taking health benefits away from seniors on a fixed income, they shouldn’t be too surprised when there’s pushback.

He also believes his comments from Wednesday were “taken out of context.” For what it’s worth, I published the entire context and linked to a video of Bush’s comments. Unfortunately for the candidate, there’s nothing in the context that makes the argument any stronger.

Finally, the Florida Republican characterizes his approach as if it were simply common sense. Medicare is not “sustainable,” he says, which means it’s up to responsible officials to agree now to “phase out” – a phrase he replaced with “reform” yesterday – Medicare altogether.

The reality, however, is far different. As Mother Jones’ Kevin Drum explained yesterday, “So this is what Jeb is saying: Right now the federal government spends about 20 percent of GDP. We can’t afford to increase that to 23 percent of GDP over the next 30 years. That would – what? I don’t even know what the story is here.... This whole thing is ridiculous. Over the next 30 years, we need to increase spending by 1 percent of GDP per decade. That’s it. That will keep Social Security and Medicare in good shape. Why is it so hard for people to get that?”

For Bush, among other GOP candidates, Medicare is facing fiscal challenges in the future, so the system must be eliminated. We must destroy Medicare, the argument goes, in order to save it. This is, of course, absurd – the challenges are perfectly manageable without radical changes to anyone’s health security.

The more Jeb Bush talks about this, the more it seems he doesn’t fully understand one of his signature issues.

Postscript: Just as an aside, the Medicare trustees’ report he encouraged voters to read shows Medicare’s fiscal health getting considerably better, not worse, in large part because of the Affordable Care Act. Jeb Bush, of course, wants to repeal the ACA, which would necessarily make the Medicare system he wants to “protect” far weaker, far faster.

Jeb Bush Says No Need to Apologize for 'All Lives Matter' // ABC // Candace Smith - July 24, 2015

As questions swirl over what happened to 28-year-old Sandra Bland, who was found dead in her cell in a Texas jail, candidates in the 2016 presidential race are being hammered on their views surrounding the call for justice and the hashtag #BlackLivesMatter.

It is a movement that largely began last year as part of the protests over the deaths of Eric Garner and Michael Brown.

Republican candidate and former Florida governor Jeb Bush was asked Thursday in New Hampshire if he thought that Democratic candidate Martin O'Malley should apologize for saying that "all lives matter" during progressive gathering, Netroots Nation.

Bush responded by asking, "We're so uptight and so politically correct now that we apologize for saying 'lives matter?"

I Emailed Jeb Bush About Guacamole, And He Actually Responded

He added, "Life is precious. It's a gift from God. I frankly think that it's one of the most important values that we have. I know in the political context it's a slogan, I guess. Should he have apologized? No. If he believes that white lives matter, which I hope he does, then he shouldn't have apologized to a group that seemed to disagree with it."

The Liberal super pac, American Bridge, quickly uploaded the video.

The 'Black Lives Matter' movement, largely led by young grassroots organizers who profess a non-partisan view, has proved to be a stumbling block for candidates on both sides. Both O'Malley and his Democratic rival Bernie Sanders were criticized for their responses to activists' demonstrations, declining to advocate specifically for Black Lives Matter, choosing the more inclusive call of "All Lives Matter."

It is a slogan viewed by activists as deeply out of touch and a view that overlooks the crux of their call to social equality and an end to the systematic prejudice they say African-Americans face in the eyes of the justice system.

Both quickly scrambled to amend his remarks; O'Malley appearing on a black talk show to say he made a mistake, Sanders forcefully condemning Bland's arrest, calling it "painful and dreadful".

On Thursday, Democratic front runner Hillary Clinton tried to overcome her own similar stumbles while speaking to a black church in South Carolina, twice invoking the "Black Lives Matter" slogan and calling Bland's death "heartbreaking".

"And that's why I think it is essential that we all stand up and say loudly and clearly, 'Yes, black lives matter.' And we all have a responsibility to face these hard truths of race and justice honestly and directly," Clinton said to cheers during a campaign stop at the Brookland Baptist Church in West Columbia, South Carolina.

Clinton was criticized last month for saying "all lives matter" at an event at a historic black church close to Ferguson, Missouri, where protesters last year widely used the phrase "Black Lives Matter."

Bush has said in the past that he will win this campaign by going to places "that haven't seen a Republican in a very long time", declaring to be able to rally the support of Latinos and African-Americans, groups that have traditionally eluded the GOP.

Here's Jeb Bush's Underwhelming Review of Sharknado 3 // TIME // Sarah Begley - July 24, 2015

"I'm culturally illiterate, apparently"

Jeb Bush has discovered Sharknado, and he is not impressed.

The 2016 contender shared his thoughts on the franchise in a video posted to his campaign's YouTube channel under his series "#JebNoFilter." He says he discovered Sharknado 3 while channel surfing in a hotel room and found it "kind of weird."

"People are getting killed, the White House is being collapsed, the Washington Monument's going down, and lo and behold, Mark Cuban is president of the United States!"

As puzzled as Bush was by the shark-filled plot, he was even more baffled to learn that it was the third movie in a series. "Please help me, give me some information about what's going on," he said into the camera. "I'm culturally illiterate, apparently."

Marco Rubio Has a New Answer For His Inexperience Problem // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur - July 24, 2015

Has Marco Rubio hit on a way to turn two political minuses into a plus?

The 44-year-old first-term senator is competing for the Republican presidential nomination against a crowded field that includes eight governors or former governors and several more experienced lawmakers. He has also been dogged by questions about his acumen when it comes to his personal finances. In recent days he has come up with an argument that seemingly attempts to handle both potential problems.

At a forum last weekend in Ames, Iowa, Republican pollster Frank Luntz told Rubio that "the single biggest knock on you" is that "you haven't been around long enough." In response, the son of Cuban immigrants from humble beginnings cleverly morphed job "experience" into life "experience," arguing that his makes him the most qualified to understand issues facing ordinary Americans.

"I don't think anybody running for president understands what life is like for people today more than I do," Rubio said, adding that his parents lived "paycheck to paycheck" and that he had student loans until four years ago. His youth and his financial struggles have given him more of kind of experience a president needs, he argued.

"No one running has more experience on the issues we face right now, today, in the 21st century, with a world that's more dangerous than ever and an economy that's changing faster than we've ever seen since the industrial revolution."

The crowd applauded.

Thursday, in another interview, Rubio trotted out a different version of the same line.

"The world is changing, and no one who is running for president has more experience than I do on the issues confronting our country right now," the freshman Florida senator told Fox News in an interview Thursday.

Fox host Bret Baier didn't seem convinced. Why, he asked, is a governor not better positioned for the White House than he is?

Rubio responded that the presidency is a "unique office" that's "not like being a senator, but it's not like being a governor, either," saying that presidents face national security challenges but that they "don't create jobs."

Republican voters tend to prefer governors to senators for the White House—and Rubio has been among them in the past as he endorsed former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee in 2008 and former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney in 2012. Recently in Iowa, a voter pointed out similarities between Rubio and then-Senator Barack Obama in 2008.

Will Rubio's new argument work? It remains to be seen, but the Floridian could use a boost. He has placed below the top three in the last five nonpartisan national polls of Republican primary voters tracked by RealClearPolitics.

The radicalism of Rubio's foreign policy // MSNBC // Steve Benen - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Earlier this week, Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) said of the international nuclear agreement with Iran, "This is not America's deal with Iran. It is Barack Obama's deal with Iran." It wasn't an offhand, impromptu comment made during an interview; the Republican senator actually included the line in a written statement.

Yesterday, during the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing on the Iran deal, Rubio made a nearly identical argument to Secretary of State John Kerry:

"Secretary Kerry, I do not fault you for trying to engage in diplomacy, and striking a deal for Iran, I don't. I do fault the president for striking a terrible deal with Iran. [...]

"[E]ven if this deal narrowly avoids congressional defeat because we can't get to that veto-proof majority, the Iranian regime and the world should know that this deal is your deal with Iran, meaning your's and this administration's, and the next president is under no legal or moral obligation to live up to it."

Obviously, when the Florida Republican refers to "the next president," Rubio believes he's referring to himself.

The surface-level issue is the concern that the GOP senator is using a serious foreign-policy debate for campaign grandstanding – Rubio wants far-right activists to see him, not his rivals, as the party's fiercest critic of nuclear diplomacy. All of the top Republicans are talking about their plans to abandon the U.S. commitment in this area, and Rubio sees value in being a top member of the club.

But just below the surface, Rubio's posturing even far more serious.

The GOP candidate is describing a foreign-policy dynamic in which every new American president, upon taking office, effectively tells the world, friend and foe alike, "Maybe I'll honor U.S. commitments, maybe not. I'll let you know."

American foreign policy has never worked this way, because it can't. The United States is a global superpower – by most measures the global superpower – in part because the world values the consistency of our leadership. If we abandon agreements reached with our allies after every election, that consistency disappears.

Imagine future negotiations between U.S. officials and foreign heads of state. What happens when those on the other side of the table tell American diplomats, "We'd accept these terms, but we're worried our agreement will be null and void after you hold elections in a few years"?

As for Rubio drawing a distinction between America's international agreements and the American president's international agreements, I'm reminded of something Max Fisher wrote in January:

The Supreme Court has codified into law the idea that only the president is allowed to make foreign policy, and not Congress, because if there are two branches of government setting foreign policy then America effectively has two foreign policies.

The idea is that the US government needs to be a single unified entity on the world stage in order to conduct effective foreign policy. Letting the president and Congress independently set their own foreign policies would lead to chaos. It would be extremely confusing for foreign leaders, and foreign publics, who don't always understand how domestic American politics work, and could very easily misread which of the two branches is actually setting the agenda.

At least so long as President Obama is in office, Rubio seems to believe that chaos is worthwhile and undermining American foreign policy – which he perceives as something less than America's foreign policy – is a responsible course for U.S. lawmakers to follow.

I have a sinking suspicion he would see things differently under a Rubio administration.

Marco Rubio: Donald Trump's not going to be the Republican nominee // Washington Times // David Sherfinski - July 24, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida said Friday that Donald Trump is not going to be the Republican presidential nominee and that the real estate mogul is benefiting from people hearing his name in the news.

"Not long term," Mr. Rubio, who is also running for president, said on "CBS This Morning" when asked if he thinks Mr. Trump is a problem for his party. "Donald Trump's not going to be the nominee of the Republican party."

Mr. Trump has been leading in recent polling on the 2016 GOP field, but Mr. Rubio said polls "swing up and down" and that he personally has been higher and lower than where he is now.

"These polls, at this point, basically are measuring who people are hearing about on the news, and Donald Trump is benefiting from that," he said. "I strongly believe that not just the next nominee, but the only way that Republicans are going to win the presidency is by offering an optimistic but realistic vision of the 21st century with a real plan of how we can benefit from all the globalization that's changing the nature of our economy, from the technological advances that have changed the nature of work, and also about playing our proper role in the world in terms of leading the free people of this planet to confront global challenges."

Top Scott Walker Fundraiser Calls Donald Trump 'Dum bDumb' // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein - July 24, 2015

A fundraiser for Scott Walker's presidential campaign called Donald Trump "DumbDumb" in a fundraising invitation and said electing the New York developer would be "a total and complete disaster for the country."

"As you've seen Gov Walker is now well ahead of everyone not named DumbDumb (aka Trump) in the national polls," wrote Walker fundraiser Gregory Slayton, a New Hampshire venture capitalist who served as consul general to Bermuda during the George W. Bush administration. "He's also a plain spoken member of the 99% (as opposed to someone pretending to be so)…and that will be a KSF in 2016."

Mr. Slayton's email invited his political network to fundraisers Wednesday in Greenwich, Conn., and at the Union League Club in New York City. His email indicated Mr. Walker will also hold "a foreign policy oriented breakfast" Thursday morning in New York.

Reached by phone Friday, Mr. Slayton said Mr. Trump is not as smart as Mr. Walker.

"I didn't mean that to be public but obviously I stand behind it," Mr. Slayton said. "Look, this is a great country. Guys who are not that smart can get rich, it's wonderful. But Donald Trump is not going to be president of the United States ever, period, end of story."

Mr. Slayton added: "To elect someone who alienates his friends, the guy would be a total and complete disaster for the country and I think everybody admits that."

carefully avoiding criticizing the New York developer's incendiary language about Mexican immigrants. The Wisconsin governor did denounce Mr. Trump's suggestion that Sen. John McCain, who served five years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was not a war hero.

Mr. Trump's campaign manager, Corey Lewandowski, predicted Mr. Walker will not stand for his supporters questioning Mr. Trump's intellect.

"Gov. Walker is a good guy and he would not condone such type of negative thinking about the leading presidential candidate in the GOP field," Mr. Lewandowski said. "I'm sure he will quickly denounce Mr. Slayton and his rhetoric."

The Walker campaign didn't comment on Mr. Slayton's remarks.

PAUL

'Super Pac' Backing Rand Paul Raised Far Less Than Rivals, Report Shows // NYT // Nick Confessore - July 24, 2015

A "super PAC" set up by allies of Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky raised just over $3 million in the first six months of the year, according to a report filed with the Federal Election Commission on Friday — far less than most of the outside groups backing Mr. Paul's rivals for the Republican presidential nomination.

Almost half of the money came from a single donor: George Macricostas, a Nevada-based businessmen and technology entrepreneur. Most of the rest came from Jeff Yass, an investor from Pennsylvania, who contributed $1 million.

A handful of other donors — some of them also raising money directly for Mr. Paul's campaign — made six-figure contributions, including Robert Arnott, a California investor, and Kenneth Garschina, a longtime Paul backer in New York.

The super PAC, America's Liberty, filed more than a week before the official deadline. It had about $2.7 million in cash at the end of June, according to the filing.

The haul was relatively low in the high-dollar, high-stakes world of super PACs, which have taken center stage in this year's Republican primary contest.

A super PAC backing Jeb Bush announced this month that it had raised $103 million, while Senator Ted Cruz of Texas is backed by a network of super PACs that brought in $37 million. Two groups supporting Senator Marco Rubio of Florida brought in a combined $32 million.

Rand Paul super PAC brings in less money than Bobby Jindal's or Carly Fiorina's // WaPo // Tom Hamburger and Anu Narayanswamy - July 24, 2015

A super PAC backing Rand Paul's presidential candidacy raised $3.1 million in the first half of 2015, with two-thirds of the total coming from just two donors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The sum reported Friday afternoon by Paul's supporters is among the smallest reported from the dozen or so presidential candidate super PACs that have so far revealed their fundraising figures.

Paul's total puts him behind Carly Fiorina, the former Hewlett Packard CEO, whose supporters reported raising $3.4 million for a super PAC. Allies of former Florida governor Jeb Bush raised nearly $103 million for the Right to Rise super PAC. Supporters of Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, reported raising just $289,000 for his super PAC during its first month.

Paul, the Kentucky senator and son of former Texas congressman and presidential candidate Ron Paul, reported raising nearly $7 million for his official campaign account -- a more respectable number, but still in the lower tier of candidate totals.

Supporters of other GOP presidential hopefuls, including Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and former Pennsylvania senator Rick Santorum, have yet to disclose totals for super PACs backing them.

The pro-Paul PAC, called America's Liberty PAC, lists two seven-figure donors: George Macricostas, the chairman and CEO of a RagingWire, a data center company, and Jeff Yass, the owner of Susquehanna Partners, an investment firm.

Rand Paul Super PAC Raised $3.1 Million in First Half of 2015 // WSJ // Rebecca Ballhaus - July 24, 2015

The primary super PAC backing Republican Rand Paul's presidential campaign raised $3.1 million in the first half of the year, according to a disclosure filed with the Federal Election Commission Friday, falling far short of the rest of the Republican field.

America's Liberty PAC's small haul, coupled with the relatively low $7 million raised by Mr. Paul's campaign in the second quarter, puts the Kentucky senator firmly in the second tier of GOP fundraising. Mr. Paul is currently polling seventh among Republican primary voters, according to a Real Clear Politics average of five recent national polls.

The super PAC's president, John Tate, said he was "very pleased" with the group's fundraising.

"We are just getting started and this financial support will allow us to continue to give Sen. Paul the help he needs in this race," he said. The group is building a "tech-savvy, highly-targeted data driven effort that can be used to effectively manage the tremendous grassroots support that Sen. Paul has built over the years," he added.

Two-thirds of the funds the super PAC raised came from two donors: Jeff Yass, owner of the trading firm Susquehanna Partners, who gave $1 million, and George Macricostas, founder of the data center company RagingWire, who gave $1.1 million. A quarter of the super PAC's haul — $750,000 – was donated by Mr. Macricostas on June 30, the final day of the reporting period. Neither donor gave to Mr. Paul's campaign in the second quarter, according to its filing with the FEC.

Aside from those two major donors, other donations to the super PAC were relatively low. The average donation, not including those of Messrs. Yass and Macricostas, was $28,500. Still, a review of the donor list suggests the group does have some room to grow: Among the contributors were millionaires John Mackey, the chief executive of Whole Foods, and land developer Don Huffines. Mr. Mackey gave $50,000; Mr. Hiffines gave $25,000.

The super PAC's haul is just 3% of the $103 million raised by the super PAC backing GOP front-runner Jeb

Bush—a record-setting sum that far surpassed any other contender in the 2016 race. But it also falls significantly short of the $38 million raised by four super PACs backing Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, as well as the $16 million raised by the pro-Florida Sen. Marco Rubio super PAC.

Even groups backing candidates who are polling lower than Mr. Paul have raised more: The super PAC backing former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who is polling nearly four percentage points below Mr. Paul, according to Real Clear Politics, raised $17 million; the group supporting New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who is nearly three points behind in the polls, raised $11 million.

Super PACs are not required to file disclosures with the FEC until July 31. The groups backing several contenders have already released their totals, but some have yet to do so.

Mr. Paul also has the backing of another super PAC, run by former FreedomWorks president Matt Kibbe, that has yet to disclose its totals.

Rand Paul super PACs raise $5 million // Politico // Daniel Strauss - July 24, 2015 wo super PACs supporting Rand Paul's presidential candidacy together raised about $5 million in the first half of the year.

One of the PACs, America's Liberty, raised $3.13 million, according to FEC filings. The second PAC, Concerned American Voters, told POLITICO it had raised $1.88 million.

That's far short of the amount raised by the super PAC backing former Florida governor Jeb Bush, which reported raising more than $100 million in the first half of the year, and short of those of other top-tier Republican presidential contenders, such as Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

The two biggest donors to America's Liberty were Nevada data mogul George Macricostas (who gave $1.1 million) and Philadelphia options trader Jeff Yass (who gave $1 million).

America's Liberty PAC is run by Jesse Benton, a longtime aide of Paul and his father, former Rep. Ron Paul, and John Tate, the president of the libertarian millennial group Campaign for Liberty.

Concerned American Voters is run by Matt Kibbe, formerly of FreedomWorks.

Each of the two super PACs has a different focus: America's Liberty PAC will likely concentrate on paid media, while Kibbe's emphasizes grassroots organizing.

"I am very pleased with these results so far," Tate said in a statement. "This sum shows that Sen. Paul has real support in this race for president and we are working tirelessly to assist him by airing TV ads, managing and collecting data and running a top-notch digital campaign.

"We are just getting started and this financial support will allow us to continue to give Sen. Paul the help he needs in this race," Tate said. "Instead of spending millions on slick TV ads, we have invested and are building a tech-savvy, highly targeted data-driven effort that can be used to effectively manage the tremendous grassroots support that Sen. Paul has built over the years."

Why Isn't Rand Paul Making a Data Deal With the GOP? // Bloomberg // Sasha Issenberg - July 24, 2015

Kentucky Senator Rand Paul is living up to his promise to run for president as a "different kind of Republican." His campaign appears to have decided that he can win the nomination without even basic help from party bosses, and that if he comes up short his loss should not serve to strengthen their infrastructure.

Several presidential candidates are likely to sign contracts allowing them to simultaneously receive voter profiles from both the Republican National Committee and i360, a rival data warehouse managed by the political network associated with Koch Industries. Paul, however, seems to be following a different path—one that will allow him to maintain full control of any data collected by his campaign or affiliated super-PAC and set up a distinct power base beyond 2016 entirely independent of the Republican Party.

Paul is the only one of the party's candidates trying to assemble a full-fledged presidential campaign who has refused to sign a so-called data agreement with the RNC. This is a standard arrangement in both parties, designed to permit candidates to benefit from one of few durable resources in American politics: a national party's voter database. In exchange for access to it, candidates pledge that after the election they will enrich the database by returning intelligence gathered on the electorate through their interactions with individual voters.

Thus far, according to a party official who asked not to be named in order to freely discuss the committee's internal mechanics, 11 of the party's presidential candidates have signed a data agreement with the RNC. The others who have have yet to sign a data agreement are all those who are are new to the race or have otherwise shown signs of mounting something other than a conventional, well-rounded national campaign: businessman Donald Trump, Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, former New York Governor George Pataki, and Jim Gilmore, former Governor of Virginia. Party officials have had conversations with Ohio Governor John Kasich's political team, and anticipate he will eventually sign one, according to a person familiar with the talks. (Data agreements are available only to those who have made their candidacy official; Kasich did so only this week.)

Voter data is essential in running a modern campaign. But the rise of a competing data warehouse, i360, managed by the Kochs' Freedom Partners, has given candidates the choice of opting out of the party structure altogether. A Freedom Partners spokesman, James Davis, refused to identify specific clients, citing non-disclosure agreements. However, it is widely understood that i360—a private company in which turning a profit is a concern secondary to electoral impact—is eager to serve as a data provider to multiple Republican candidates.

In an April interview with USA Today, Charles Koch identified five he said "are the ones we have talked to the most and who seem to be the possible leaders." Four of them—former Governor Jeb Bush of Florida, Governor Scott Walker of Wisconsin, Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida—have already executed data agreements with the RNC. Paul is the only one who hasn't.

Paul quarterly spending report depicted a candidate seeking to assemble a data infrastructure entirely independent of the RNC. He has paid $19,000 to Aristotle International, a venerable non-partisan data vendor favored by candidates unaligned with a party machine. Paul's campaign also paid a sum to the Republican Party of Iowa that could been to purchase a list of past caucus-goers, a standard move for candidates competing in the state. The newly established super-PAC Concerned American Voters has vowed to maintain Paul's "grassroots organization, e-marketing and proven Get Out The Vote tactics," as president Jeff Frazee described it in a press release announcing the group's creation. Filings from Concerned American Voters show a variety of payments to i360, including one for "Voter Data and Outreach Capability."

The RNC and i360 have developed an intense and unexpectedly public feud as they compete over business from Republican candidates, a proxy for the greater conflict between the Koch network and party establishment for dominance in conservative politics. The left has featured a similar tension for nearly a decade, as the Democratic National Committee's voter file battles for primacy against one maintained by the independent Catalist, which has close ties to organized labor. (The crucial difference: i360 currently holds a stronger market position than Catalist does on its side, and the factional rivalries within the right are far more pronounced than those within the left.)

Although both databases are assembled atop publicly available voter-registration records, they offer differing strengths. The RNC has maintained its voter file for a quarter-century, constantly replenishing it with information about voter behavior and attitudes on candidates and issues collected through campaign canvasses and phone banks. Want to know which Iowa voters told McCain-Palin volunteers that bailouts were their greatest concern? There's only one place to find it.

The much-newer i360 has little of that historical data, but sustained by the Kochs' seemingly limitless funds, boasts of having acquired a wide range of consumer profiles and a growing team of data scientists developing topical predictive models from them. Looking for probable 2016 caucus-goers who are likely to think the Islamic State is a greater concern than civil liberties? You should expect to see it offered from i360 rather than the RNC.

Many Republican analysts see the two entities' data as potentially complementary, particularly if combined to form a larger base for predictive models specific to a candidate's targeting needs. (Campaigns that arrange to work with both the RNC and i360 are required to sign a contract ensuring that the underlying sets of data are not commingled.)

Paul's unorthodox appeal and strategy may dictate his posture toward the RNC. Paul has vowed to bring new supporters into the Republican primary process, including young voters unlikely to have been contacted much by previous Republican candidates. If Paul succeeds in doing so, the granular intelligence his campaign assembles about that coalition—knowledge of individual issue preferences, and contact information like cell-phone numbers—will become a unique asset in American politics and one he will be happy not to have to return to the RNC.

Paul's own campaign could theoretically acquire any data collected by the super-PAC at any point, either through purchase or by trading something of comparable value. If structured correctly, Paul could then match intelligence gathered from the super-PAC's field operations to his own list, which the campaign has been cultivating through stunts like his quasi-filibuster of the Patriot Act and this week's video taking a chainsaw to the tax code. Those backers, pushed to the campaign's website to sign up as supporters, have shared e-mail addresses and given the campaign the opportunity to serve them ads elsewhere online through browser cookies.

Complete control over all the data his campaign collects could make Paul a power broker in future party primaries, and sustain a career as a perpetual candidate—with a constant implied threat that he could do it either inside the party or outside of it. Rand's father, former Representative Ron Paul of Texas, sought the presidency twice as a Republican and once as the Libertarian Party's nominee. When asked to explain Rand Paul's resistance to signing a data agreement with the RNC, spokesman Sergio Gor responded by e-mail, "We'll pass on this story."

But Paul himself betrayed his thinking about his relationship with the party when he announced his candidacy in April. "Too often when Republicans have won we have squandered our victory by becoming part of the Washington machine," he said during a speech in Louisville. "That's not who I am."

Rand Paul super PACs raise paltry $5 million // CNN // Theodore Schleifer - July 24, 2015

The two super PACs supporting Rand Paul raised less money than many of his Republican rivals in the first half of 2015, confirming speculation that he would face difficulty financing his grassroots campaign.

The main super PAC led by Paul's former advisers, America's Liberty PAC, raised $3.1 million, according to a filing, far less than nearly every other Republican candidate's. And a second, grassroots-focused group dedicated to electing him, Concerned American Voters, said in a statement to CNN Friday that it had raised an additional $1.9 million.

Jeb Bush shattered records by raising $103 million for his super PAC, but even the allied groups of candidates who perform significantly worse than Paul in polls managed to outraise Paul's by significant margins.

Rick Perry's claimed $17 million, Chris Christie's said it brought in $11 million, and even the group allied with Carly Fiorina -- who is unlikely to have enough support to make the Republican debate -- said it raised more than Paul's main group with $3.4 million.

Despite the poor numbers, the head of America's Liberty indicated they would build a leaner operation not focused entirely on television campaigns, which in recent cycles have been in super PACs' bailiwick.

"Instead of spending millions on slick TV ads, we have invested and are building a tech-savvy, highly-targeted data driven effort that can be used to effectively manage the tremendous grassroots support that Sen. Paul has built over the years," John Tate, the group's president, said in a statement.

Paul does seem to have two major supporters, however: Philadelphia investor Jeff Yass and Nevada IT executive George Macricostas, who each gave about $1 million to support America's Liberty. Concerned American Voters has not yet released the names of its backers, but will have to by the end of the next week.

Donors can make unlimited contributions to super PACs, but the groups aren't allowed to coordinate how to spend that money with the campaign.

Paul's own campaign also trailed the official operations of many other hopefuls: The Kentucky senator only raised $7 million in what are called "hard dollars."

Paul has placed a particular emphasis on recruiting donors in Silicon Valley, but there is no sign that he succeeded: Only four donors with California addresses donated to America's Liberty, for a total of $56,000.

Rand Paul Launches Snapchat Ads // TIME // Zeke J. Miller - July 24, 2015

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul was one of the first 2016 presidential contenders to embrace Snapchat, and now he’s becoming one of the first to advertise on the platform.

Paul’s campaign is placing three ads on the social network this weekend as part of a broader digital campaign soliciting ideas for how the libertarian lawmaker can destroy the tax code. The 10-second video spots are cut from a longer video released earlier this week featuring Paul fire, using fire, a woodchipper and a chainsaw to tear up piles of papers, all set to an electric guitar rendition of the “Star Spangled Banner.”

The ad campaign is the latest effort by Paul to revive a campaign that is in danger of falling behind amid a softening of his support in the polls and lackluster fundraising for the campaign and super PAC.

The ads are targeted at all users in the four early voting states, Iowa, Nevada, South Carolina and New Hampshire, and his campaign hopes they will appeal to the platform’s younger-skewing demographic.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last week, Snapchat featured two ads for Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and one for Ohio Gov. John Kasich in a politically-themed "live story" for users on the platform from the four early states. Paul's ads are aimed at all users from those states, not just those viewing the "live story," including those using Snapchat's "discover" feature.

"Many younger 'off-the-grid' voters aren't consuming traditional news outlets and are increasingly using platforms like snapchat as their source of information," said Vincent Harris, Paul's digital strategist. "Senator Paul's campaign plans to continue to run ads and connect with voters in this way."

Harris would not reveal the dollar-amount behind the buy, adding, "The campaign will continue to spend more after we see the ROI. This is new and exciting territory."

Rand Paul Destroys the Tax Code? Donald Trump Is Contagious! // Forbes // Christopher Bergin - July 24, 2015

For several days, you couldn't turn on the TV or radio looking for news without running into "in-depth reporting" on what Donald Trump said about John McCain. This especially included the Sunday news shows – which I admit with some shame I still watch.

I wasn't sure if what Trump had to say about a bona fide war hero was really news to begin with, but by the 3,000th "news report" on it I was sure its news cycle was over. Reporters should know by now that when Trump says something incredibly idiotic, there is no need to dwell on it because within days he'll say something even worse. (A friend of mine and I are thinking of starting a pool — kind of an over-under for when the next ludicrous comment comes up.)

The danger of Donald Trump acting as if he is P.T. Barnum is that other presidential candidates will decide that the American voter is attracted to stupid stuff. And a huge target about which to say really stupid stuff is the tax code. Now, it's OK if you want to pick on the nation's tax law because it is too complicated, inconsistent, and unfair. But it's also very serious business, the main purpose of which is to create the rules by which we collect the revenue to fund the U.S government. Hurling insults at the tax code is not going to solve any problems.

But someone needs to tell Rand Paul that. Taking a page from Donald Trump, Paul just released a brand-new video featuring him destroying the U.S. tax code. On the video, Paul sets thousands of pages of tax law on fire, feeds them into a wood chipper, and goes after them with a chain saw. Apparently, Paul's own favorite method is the chain saw, but he urges people to vote on which they like best.

Paul doesn't appear very handy with a chain saw, but at least he's wearing eye protection. The senator is an ophthalmologist. Maybe he should stay with that and leave the clownish performance pieces to trained clowns — like Donald Trump (I hope Trump gives out my phone number for that shot).

The point of Paul's video is to promote his "Fair and Flat Tax," essentially a flat tax of 14.5 percent that eliminates almost all special deductions and other giveaways. I'm not saying it's a bad plan or that it shouldn't be part of the discussion, but how can you take a presidential candidate's plan seriously when he introduces it with a wood chipper? In the promotional material for Paul's tax plan, he saves a great deal of vitriol for the IRS, which of course is easy to hate, and at times appears only too happy to pour fuel onto its own fires. Paul calls the IRS a "rogue" agency whose corruption it enabled by a convoluted tax code. Well, the IRS didn't impose a convoluted tax code on itself; Congress did. I don't know how any agency could efficiently administer our tax code.

Does the IRS need to be reformed starting with an entirely new leadership structure? Yes. But even if Paul gets his flat tax, who will collect that tax if we also "destroy" the IRS? Apparently that's one the senator has no answer for. Anyway, it's more fun playing with a chain saw and following Donald Trump's lead than it is thinking about the tough stuff.

Maybe we need two pools: one on the next stupid thing Trump says, and one on the next presidential candidate to start imitating him. I've predicted that it will take two years to start a serious discussion of reforming the tax laws and the agency that administers them. After watching Paul's video, I've pushed that back a decade.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz Accuses Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Lying // NYT // Jonathan Weisman - July 24, 2015

Senator Ted Cruz, the sometimes-incendiary Texan running for the Republican presidential nomination, took to the Senate floor on Friday to call his party's majority leader a liar in an extraordinary public airing of grievance.

Mr. Cruz, an ardent opponent of the federal Export-Import Bank, reacted in starkly personal terms after the leader, Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, allowed a vote pressed by a bipartisan group of senators to resurrect the government's export credit agency.

That vote will come Sunday in a rare weekend session of Congress called to rush forward a major infrastructure bill before the Highway Trust Fund runs out of money July 31.

"I cannot believe he would tell a flat-out lie," Mr. Cruz said of Mr. McConnell, who he said had promised him there was no deal to bring Ex-Im up for a vote.

Mr. Cruz said allowing that vote on the measure — which almost certainly will pass — was "an absolute demonstration that not only what he told every Republican senator, but what he told the press over and over and over again was a simple lie."

The outburst breached the Senate's decorum — and perhaps its rules, which preclude a senator from using "any form of words" to "impute to another senator or to other senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a senator." Mr. McConnell and his staff declined to comment.

Aides to Senator John Cornyn, a fellow Texan, said the Senate's No. 2 Republican is reviewing Mr. Cruz's speech.

Mr. Cruz has been a combative figure since his arrival in the Senate in 2013, when he helped shut down the government in a fruitless effort to defund the Affordable Care Act. He also pressed to shut down the Department of Homeland Security this year over President Obama's executive orders on immigration.

While Mr. Cruz frequently challenges Democrats, he has largely refrained from attacking fellow Republicans.

"In my time in the Senate I haven't impugned the character of Republicans or Democrats and I don't intend to start today," he said earlier this month, when pressed to condemn a fellow Republican White House hopeful, Donald J. Trump, who had questioned Senator John McCain's wartime heroism.

On Friday, Mr. Cruz held nothing back. He detailed what he said was a closed-door confrontation he had with Mr. McConnell in May, after supporters of the Export-Import Bank tried to derail a trade bill unless they were promised a vote to keep the bank open.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It was a direct question I asked the majority leader in front of all the Republican senators," he said. He said that Mr. McConnell had been "visibly angry" and that "like St. Peter," the majority leader had offered a denial three times: "There is no deal, there is no deal, there is no deal."

Far from backing down, Mr. Cruz joined Rush Limbaugh Friday afternoon, basking in the conservative radio show host's praise for a "direct hit" on leadership like none Mr. Limbaugh could remember.

"It's not a good day when the majority leader is willing to lie to the Senate," Mr. Cruz told Mr. Limbaugh.

Tea Party groups, the Heritage Foundation's political arm, and the Koch Brothers' Freedom Partners rushed to Mr. Cruz's defense.

Support for Ex-Im in both the House and Senate is sufficient to restore the agency if Republican leaders allow it. On June 30, the authorization ran out on Ex-Im, which offers loan guarantees and other assistance to the foreign customers of American exporters.

Businesses — powered by some of the nation's biggest corporations — Boeing, General Electric and Caterpillar — have been pressing to reopen it, arguing that the conservative war on Ex-Im is costing American jobs in the service of a purely ideological fight. On the other side of the money fight, Delta Air Lines, the Koch Brothers, Club for Growth, and the Heritage Foundation are fueling Ex-Im opposition.

Mr. Cruz framed the fight as one pitting "the Washington cartel of the lobbyists on K Street, or the big money and big corporations" against the American taxpayer. Money has in fact sloshed through both sides of the fight. Among Republican presidential candidates only Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, where Boeing operations benefit from Ex-Im financing, supports restoring the bank.

Mr. McConnell, in allowing a vote to reopen the bank Sunday afternoon, was careful to say he personally opposed it. At the same time, he offered conservatives a compromise in the form of a separate amendment to the highway bill to repeal the Affordable Care Act.

Mr. Cruz called that "an empty show vote."

"The Republican leader is behaving like the senior senator from Nevada," Mr. Cruz said, accusing Mr. McConnell of running the Senate the same way his predecessor, Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, had operated.

In a test vote last month, 65 senators — Republican and Democrat — showed they would vote for the Ex-Im Bank's reauthorization. In the House, 60 Republicans have signed onto legislation to reopen new lending activity at the bank, more than enough to pass a bill that has overwhelming Democratic support.

The question is whether Speaker John A. Boehner will buck the opposition of other Republicans on his leadership team to allow the Senate's Ex-Im amendment to come to a vote.

Ted Cruz Breaks Vow to Not Criticize Other Republicans // NYT // Alan Rappeport - July 24, 2015

Senator Ted Cruz of Texas has made taking the high road a hallmark of his presidential campaign so far, vowing not to get into fights with other Republicans. Apparently Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky is not covered by that policy.

Mr. Cruz's animus was unleashed on Friday because Mr. McConnell allowed a vote to move forward on the federal Export-Import Bank, which Mr. Cruz opposes.

Here are few of Mr. Cruz's recent promises of intra-party civility:

"I understand that our friends in the media love to see Republicans shoot each other. That makes for good newsprint when it gets nasty and personal, but I have no intention of going there," Mr. Cruz said in speaking to The Daily Caller in May about being nice to his rivals for the Republican presidential nomination.

"I'm not gonna engage in the media's game of throwing rocks and attacking other Republicans. I'm just not gonna do it," Mr. Cruz said on July 6, speaking about Donald J. Trump's remarks on immigration.

"To the best of my knowledge, in my time in the Senate, I have not spoken ill of any of my colleagues, Republicans or Democrats. When others attack me, for whatever reason that's happened once or twice, my response consistently is to respond with praise. To take the high road," Mr. Cruz said at the Family Leadership Summit in Iowa on July 18.

But on Friday, Mr. Cruz took a different approach:

"Well, we now know that when the majority leader looks us in the eyes and makes an explicit commitment that he is willing to say things that he knows are false," Mr. Cruz said on the Senate floor in a speech in which he accused Mr. McConnell of telling a "flat-out lie" and compared him to Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the former majority leader loathed by many Republicans.

Ted Cruz to GOP leader: You lied. // WaPo // Mike DeBonis - July 24, 2015

Firebrand Republican senator and presidential candidate Ted Cruz did something surprising in the Senate on Friday: He accused the head of his party, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, of lying to his colleagues.

"We know now that when the majority leader looks us in the eyes and makes an explicit commitment, that he is willing to say things that he knows are false," Cruz (Tex.) said. "That has consequences for how this body operates."

Cruz's remarks laid bare, in the most august of settings, simmering tensions between the conservative activist wing of the Republican Party and the mainstream GOP establishment. In his 20-minute speech, Cruz accused McConnell (Ky.) of running the Senate in much the same manner as his Democratic predecessor as majority leader, Harry M. Reid (Nev.).

"There is a profound disappointment among the American people because we keep winning elections, and then we keep getting leaders who don't do anything they promised," Cruz said. "We've had a Republican majority in both houses of Congress now for about six months. . . . This Senate operates exactly the same, the same priorities."

Prompting the outburst was McConnell's move to prepare amendment votes on a must-pass transportation bill. After senators voted to consider the bill, McConnell set up votes on two controversial issues — a repeal of the Affordable Care Act and a reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank of the United States. Not included were such issues as immigration enforcement and cuts to Planned Parenthood funding, for which Cruz and other conservatives had pushed.

The move incensed Cruz, who had announced his intention to offer other amendments and who, like many conservatives, strongly opposes the bank's reauthorization despite the support it enjoys among a supermajority of senators. That puts him at odds with McConnell, who has attempted to keep major legislation moving steadily through the Senate and has struck deals and engaged in procedural maneuvers to avoid getting bogged down, with uneven success.

Though McConnell has personally spoken against the Export-Import Bank's reauthorization, Democrats said in June that he had agreed to schedule a vote on the bank in order to get highly divisive trade legislation passed.

Cruz said Friday that McConnell, in a private Republican conference meeting, denied that any deal had been struck to pass the trade bill.

"I asked the majority leader very directly: What was the deal that was just cut?" Cruz recalled. "The majority leader was visibly angry with me that I would ask such a question, and the majority leader looked at me and said, 'There is no deal, there is no deal, there is no deal.' Like Saint Peter, he repeated it three times."

McConnell spokesman Don Stewart declined to comment.

Rule XIX

Senators generally refrain from impugning their colleagues on the floor, a practice codified in Senate Rule XIX: "No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator."

The penalty for breaching that rule is to be ordered to take one's seat — in effect, to sit down and shut up. But no senator rose to make a point of order before Cruz left the floor.

"It's unusual, certainly," Betty K. Koed, the Senate's official historian, said of Cruz's remarks. "The Senate prides itself on being an environment of polite, respectful decorum, but this happens from time to time."

In a 1995 speech on Senate decorum, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) denounced senators who accuse their colleagues of dissembling: "The use of such maledicent language on the Senate floor is quite out of place, and to accuse other senators of being liars is to skate on very, very thin ice, indeed."

Rule XIX was nearly invoked in 1988 after Sen. Phil Gramm (R-Tex.) accused Sen. H. John Heinz III (R-Pa.) and others of being "spokesmen" for "special interest groups." But after Heinz rose in protest, Gramm withdrew his remarks.

Cruz's statement would seem to be a more serious breach of floor comity than Gramm's. But they both fall well short of other, more distant floor antics — such as the time, during debate on the Compromise of 1850, that Henry S. Foote of Mississippi pulled a pistol on fellow Democrat Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri, or the 1902 fistfight between South Carolina Democrats Benjamin R. Tillman and John L. McLaurin.

Presidential ambitions

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah), the longest-serving Republican senator, defended McConnell and criticized Cruz to reporters Friday: “I don’t think we make headway around here by implying, even, that other people are liars.”

He also made note of Cruz’s presidential bid, which registered single-digit national support in the most recent Washington Post-ABC News poll of Republican candidates. “People who run for president do some very interesting things from time to time, so we should allow wide leeway there, too,” Hatch said.

Presidential ambitions have been a source of continuing headaches for McConnell as he has sought to keep the Senate productive in his first months as floor leader. In April, amendments offered by Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) helped short-circuit debate on a bill setting up congressional review of an Iran nuclear deal. A month later, Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) derailed McConnell’s plan to extend key federal surveillance authorities, which were forced to lapse briefly because of Paul’s objections.

In recent weeks, McConnell signaled that the transportation bill would be a likely vehicle for the Export-Import Bank’s reauthorization. Before Cruz spoke, McConnell said he had no choice but to allow the vote, saying that the bank’s supporters “made it clear they’re ready to stop all other amendments if denied that opportunity.”

“They have already proven they have the votes to back up the threat, as well,” he said, referring to a June 10 test vote in which 65 senators supported reauthorization. “This presents a challenge for the Senate and to opponents of the Ex-Im Bank, like myself, in particular.”

Hatch, who has been at the center of the trade and highway debates as Finance Committee chairman, defended McConnell by saying it has been clear for two months that there would be a vote on the Export-Import Bank — ever since Democrats, particularly Sen. Maria Cantwell (Wash.), threatened to defeat the trade bill over the expiration of the bank’s charter.

“I think everybody knew that he had said that he would help the senator get a vote,” Hatch said. “To me, that was publicly known.”

McConnell said Friday that he considered the dueling health-care and bank amendments to be a “compromise,” noting that a vote on repealing the Affordable Care Act is “something nearly every Republican wants.”

But Cruz, a fierce opponent of the health-care law, was not mollified by McConnell’s move to bring up a repeal vote, calling it “empty showmanship.”

“We’ll have a vote on repealing Obamacare,” he said. “The Republicans will all vote yes; the Democrats will all vote no. It will be at a 60-vote threshold. It will fail. It will be an exercise in meaningless political theater.”

Cruz to McConnell: You’re a liar // WaPo // Elise Viebeck - July 24, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) broke an unspoken rule of etiquette on the Senate floor Friday when he called Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) a liar as the chamber worked on a must-pass transportation bill.

Cruz's outburst took place after McConnell set up votes on two controversial amendments — repeal of the Affordable Care Act and reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank — in a way that would make it difficult for other amendments to receive votes.

As The Post's Mike DeBonis reports, the vote on Ex-Im surprised and enraged Cruz:

While McConnell has personally spoken against Ex-Im reauthorization, Democrats said in June he had agreed to schedule an Ex-Im vote in order to get highly divisive trade legislation passed.

But McConnell at the time denied that any deal had been struck, and Cruz said Friday the same assurance was given in a private Republican conference meeting.

"We had a Senate Republican lunch where I stood up and I asked the majority leader very directly, what was the deal that was just cut on [trade legislation, and was there a deal for the Export-Import Bank?' [Cruz said.]

'It was a direct question. I asked the majority leader in front of all the Republican senators. The majority leader was visibly angry with me that I would ask such a question, and the majority leader looked at me and said, 'There is no deal, there is no deal, there is no deal.'

'Like Saint Peter, he repeated it three times,' Cruz added."

Ted Cruz debated Code Pink protesters for 24 minutes // WaPo // David Weigel - July 24, 2015

It was supposed to be a quick show of strength by conservative groups opposed to the nuclear agreement between Iran and the United States. It turned into a debate between the self-identified avatar of "courageous conservatives" and the omnipresent anti-war activists of Code Pink -- and it lasted as long as the average sitcom episode. The result, captured on video by the Cruz-positive team at Breitbart News, is among the most popular conservative entertainment of the past week.

The drama began on Thursday afternoon, when Concerned Women for America brought Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) and Christians United for Israel campaigner Gary Bauer to the gates of the White House. Code Pink's presence was a given. Led by Medea Benjamin, who in the last few years has interrupted everyone from President Obama to Henry Kissinger, the group relentlessly works its way into congressional hearings and political events. If there is a picture of a political figure with angry protesters holding signs behind him, odds are Code Pink did it. (The pinkness is a play on the long-defunct, much mocked Department of Homeland Security color code for potential risks.)

Cruz issued his familiar arguments. Code Pink activists, easily able to swarm an outdoor event like this, kept heckling. After a few minutes, Cruz dared the loudest heckler to stand and debate him.

"It is very interesting to see those who profess to believe in free speech be afraid of speech," said Cruz. "Hold on a second -- sir, come forward. You want to be a part of the discussion?"

The main heckler stood down, and Code Pink dispatched Benjamin to debate Cruz. He talked about the deal, specifically. She talked about the benefits of diplomacy, generally.

"Over $100 billion will flow to Iran that they will use to fund jihadists that will murder people," said Cruz.

"The only way we're going to stop Iran from getting a nuclear weapon is through negotiation," said Benjamin, who insisted that Iran's real nuclear ambitions were still mysterious, or over-hyped.

"I think in debates, truth matters," said Cruz. "One entity with whom there is no ambiguity, in terms of whether Iran wants nuclear weapons, is Ayatollah Khameini... I recognize that the Code Pink folks like to hold up signs saying, 'Peace with Iran.' Do you know who doesn't reciprocate those views? Iran."

Code Pink protesters did not stutter or falter. But they were pitted against one of the best debaters at the high levels of American politics. This encounter did not make the rounds on the left; it went viral on the right. A recap of the debate became the top trending story at the Washington Examiner. Washington Free Beacon reporter Adam Kredo, who stood right by Cruz during the debate, reported that the senator "tussled with and shut down a group of left wing activists." On the first-generation conservative blog Powerline, it was reported that Cruz had "crushed" Code Pink.

Few senators would have bothered. Earlier this year, when a Code Pink heckler interrupted a meeting of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told the "low-life scum" to exit. Security made it so. But Cruz saw a chance to work a speedbag, in full view of the conservative base that he courts. He took that chance. A debate with actual Republican opponents will follow in less than three weeks.

Ted Cruz Says GOP Leader McConnell Told ‘Flat-Out Lie’ // WSJ // Isaac Stanley-Becker - July 24, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz, the conservative Texas firebrand and Republican presidential candidate, on Friday accused Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) of lying to him, in an unusually personal jab for a body that holds itself to a strict standard of decorum.

“The majority leader looked me in the eye and looked 54 Republicans in the eye,” Mr. Cruz said toward the end of a nearly 20-minute speech on the Senate floor. “I cannot believe he would tell a flat-out lie, and I voted based on those assurances that he made to each and every one of us."

Mr. Cruz was referring to a lunch meeting of Senate Republicans in which he stood up and asked Mr. McConnell a question about talks over granting President Barack Obama fast-track trade negotiating authority. Mr. Cruz wanted to know whether Mr. McConnell had agreed, as part of the trade talks, to also call a vote on reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank, which formally expired July 1.

Several Democrats urged Republican leaders to hitch the bank to the trade legislation, which they ultimately declined to do. Mr. Cruz said he and his staff suspected a deal had been struck to hold the vote on a separate piece of legislation. Lawmakers have disagreed about the precise nature of how Mr. McConnell said he planned to address the bank's reauthorization, which a supermajority of senators backed in a show vote in June.

"The majority leader looked at me and said there is no deal," Mr. Cruz said.

Mr. McConnell on Friday scheduled a Sunday vote on reauthorization of the bank, which provides financing for U.S. exports, as an amendment to the highway bill that Republican leaders are hoping to advance next week. Along with the vote on the bank, whose reauthorization is supported by most Democrats and some Republicans, Mr. McConnell scheduled a separate amendment vote on repeal of the Affordable Care Act, which remains a legislative target of Congressional Republicans following two Supreme Court rulings upholding central components of the law.

The Senate voted earlier this year on a GOP budget resolution that included a repeal of much of the health law. But this would be the first time in this congressional session that the Senate would vote on a separate measure to undo the law, which is unlikely to surmount the 60-vote threshold. The GOP-controlled House has voted numerous times to repeal the health law, including in February of this year.

McConnell said his plan to bring up both amendments was a "more balanced proposal," adding, "Ex-Im shouldn't be the only vote we take on this bill."

But Mr. Cruz, who opposes the Ex-Im bank reauthorization, denounced the move as duplicitous – "a simple lie," he said, accusing Mr. McConnell of cowing to lobbyists and Democrats.

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R., Utah) countered that Mr. McConnell has made clear, even as publicly as on the Senate floor, that he would ensure a vote on the bank's reauthorization.

"I don't think any member of the Senate should use that kind of language against another senator unless they can show definitive proof that there was a lie," Mr. Hatch said. "And I know the leader didn't lie, because I've been involved in all these negotiations."

Mr. Hatch hinted Mr. Cruz's presidential aspirations may be to blame for the provocative remark.

"People who run for president do some very interesting things," he said, heaping praise on Mr. McConnell as one of the best lawmakers to ever lead the Senate.

Katherine Scott, an associate Senate historian, said civility has been the rule of the Senate, but there have been infrequent violations. In 1902, South Carolina Sen. John McLaurin accused the state's senior senator, Ben Tillman, of telling "a willful, malicious and deliberate lie." Mr. Tillman responded by punching Mr. McLaurin in the jaw.

The skirmish led to a change in the Senate rules, which now proscribe senators from imputing to another member "conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a senator."

Ted Cruz accuses Mitch McConnell of telling a 'flat-out lie' // Politico // Manu Raju - July 24, 2015

Ted Cruz took to the Senate floor Friday and charged that Mitch McConnell told a "lie," escalating his campaign against GOP leaders and challenging the traditions of the usually decorous chamber.

In a scathing floor speech, the Texas firebrand accused the Senate majority leader of breaking his word to him and the rest of the GOP conference over McConnell's plans for the controversial Export-Import Bank, the country's chief export credit agency. In Cruz's telling, McConnell privately promised him and other Republicans that "there was no deal" with a handful of senators who were seeking to revive the bank in exchange for their votes to advance a major trade bill in May.

McConnell, he said, became "visibly angry" when Cruz challenged him on the matter during a meeting in May.

"Like St. Peter," Cruz said, "he repeated it three times. He said, 'The only thing I told the proponents of the Export-Import Bank is like any other senator in this body, they could offer any amendment they liked on an any amendable vehicle, but I gave them nothing.'"

That day in late May, Cruz said his staff informed him that McConnell was "lying" to him, but he said he believed the Senate GOP leader that "he wasn't lying to us."

But after McConnell took procedural steps Friday to move to a proposal to revive the Ex-Im bank, Cruz said on the Senate floor: "I cannot believe he would tell a flat-out lie."

Republican presidential candidate Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., leaves after speaking at the Georgia Republican Convention, Friday, May 15, 2015, in Athens, Ga. Georgia

"What we saw today was an absolute demonstration that not only what he told every Republican senator, but what he told the press over and over again was a simple lie," said Cruz, a fierce opponent of the bank. "The majority and minority leader, arm-in-arm again, should not team up against the American taxpayers."

The attack is unusual even for Cruz, who has made his battle with Senate Republicans a centerpiece of his campaign for the GOP presidential nomination. Senators tend to avoid directly calling out specific senators on the Senate floor — particularly from their own party and especially their own party leader. Senate rules say, "no senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another senator or to other senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a senator."

Asked to comment, McConnell smiled and walked away. Sen. John Cornyn, a fellow Texas Republican and McConnell's chief deputy, said he was reviewing Cruz's remarks and would not comment further.

After initially declining to comment on the Ex-Im dispute, Sen. Mike Lee, a close Cruz ally who is wooing the GOP establishment to ward off any primary threat in Utah next year, said he "was surprised and disappointed that such aggressive tactics were used to resurrect the Export-Import Bank, a policy most Senate Republicans oppose," in a statement.

The bank has become a flashpoint in the battle between the GOP's business and tea party wings. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce argues that the bank's support is essential in promoting American exports and supporting more than a million U.S. jobs. But conservative groups like Heritage Action and the Koch brothers' Americans for Prosperity argue that the bank is nothing more than corporate welfare that picks winners and losers and should be disbanded.

The GOP versus GOP fight led to the expiration of the 80-year-old bank's charter in July, preventing it from backing any new loans. But a bipartisan majority in the Senate is pushing hard to revive it, putting McConnell in the crosshairs.

McConnell, who opposes the bank, vowed to three senators who strongly support the bank — Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Washington Sens. Maria Cantwell and Patty Murray — that he would allow a vote on the bank's charter during high-stakes negotiations over the trade bill in May. After those assurances, those three senators voted to advance the fast-track bill, which eventually became law and will pave the way for the sweeping Trans-Pacific Partnership.

With Congress now headed to an August recess, the bank's proponents are looking to find any legislative vehicle that will revive it. The last remaining vehicle is a highway bill that must pass before the August recess. So McConnell on Friday filed a cloture motion to break a filibuster and bring up the Export-Import Bank measure on Sunday. He also filed cloture on a full-scale repeal of Obamacare, which could give him some political cover on the right after the backlash from his moves to allow the bank's charter to be revived.

But since the Obamacare vote will fail to surmount a Democratic filibuster, Cruz lashed McConnell for "empty showmanship."

During his speech, Cruz also strongly rebuked the GOP Senate majority's record this Congress, rebutting McConnell's argument that the new Republican majority has fulfilled its promises to voters.

"We've had a Republican majority in both houses of Congresses now for about six months. What has that majority done? First thing we did, in December, we passed a $1 trillion crominbus plan filled with pork and corporate welfare. Then this Republican majority voted to fund Obamacare, voted to fund President Obama's unconstitutional executive amnesty. And then the leadership rammed through the confirmation of Loretta Lynch as attorney general."

Cruz added: "Madam President, which of those decisions would be one iota different if Harry Reid were still majority leader? Not a one. Not a one."

He added that McConnell is "behaving" like Reid by limiting debate and amendments on the Senate floor, even arguing that the GOP leader did not put up a strong enough fight to push for Republican votes during debate over an Iran congressional review bill this past spring. Cruz recounted a private conversation in McConnell's office over their dispute.

As he walked off the Senate floor, Cruz didn't stop insulting McConnell.

He told reporters that he would try to force a procedural vote on an amendment to force Iran to recognize Israel's right to exist and release the four American hostages held in Tehran. Forcing a procedural vote — to overturn the ruling of the chair — is another highly unusual move, particularly for a rank-and-file senator challenging his own leadership.

"I assume leadership is going to whip against that amendment," Cruz said.

In the 15-minute press availability, Cruz was asked to produce evidence that McConnell is a liar. He sent aides to his Senate desk, and he circulated photos from the Senate floor of Graham and Cantwell huddling with McConnell and his deputies on the Senate floor during the tense vote on Trade Promotion Authority. Cruz said at a subsequent party lunch, he challenged McConnell “explicitly” to find out what deal they cut.

“If the majority leader is willing to lie to 54 Republicans to their face, when is he willing to do so again?” Cruz said.

Republican White House hopeful Cruz calls McConnell a liar // Reuters // David Morgan and Richard Cowan - July 24, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz ripped into his party's establishment on Friday, calling Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell a liar during an unusual public attack on the floor of the Senate.

Amid intense maneuvering over an ambitious $340 billion transportation bill, Cruz railed that McConnell and the Senate's new Republican majority were serving the interests of big money lobbyists and corporations, because of a move to offer an amendment to reauthorize the U.S. Export-Import Bank.

Cruz, a fiery first-term Senator who helped shut down the federal government in 2013, is among 16 presidential candidates vying for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination. He has also used his Senate perch to try and gain traction among voters by criticizing what he calls "Supreme Court activism" over gay marriage and Obamacare.

He said McConnell assured him months ago at a meeting of Republican senators that there would be no deal to revive the U.S. export credit agency's charter, which expired June 30. The measure now expected to come before the Senate on Sunday has substantial bipartisan support.

In rhetoric tinged with Biblical overtones, the Texas Republican said McConnell denied three times "like St. Peter" that there was a deal to bring Ex-Im bank to a vote.

"What we just saw today was an absolute demonstration that not only what he told every Republican senator, but what he told the press over and over and over again was a simple lie," Cruz said.

"We now know that when the majority leader looks us in the eyes and makes an explicit commitment, that he is willing to say things that he knows are false."

The incendiary outburst, unusual in the cordial atmosphere of the Senate, came less than two weeks before the first televised Republican debate, in which the mud-slinging mogul Donald Trump could take center stage.

The tirade also reflected heightened tensions as the campaign trail heats up, as well as trouble ahead for Congress with major tax-and-spending challenges coming in September.

Cruz accused the Republican-controlled Senate generally of ignoring the interests of voters and listening instead to "the lobbyists on K Street ... big money and big corporations."

McConnell's office had no immediate comment.

Days ahead of a long August recess, the Senate was working to pass legislation to replenish the federal Highway Trust Fund, which pays for about half the country's transportation projects and is on track to run out of money.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The ambitious bipartisan Senate bill to provide three years of funding for America's roads, bridges and rail systems was getting loaded down with unrelated amendments.

McConnell is trying to advance the legislation by allowing amendments popular to each side. For instance: repeal of Obamacare for Republicans; for Democrats, reauthorization of Ex-Im Bank, which helps U.S. exporters.

William Shatner: Ted Cruz calling Kirk a Republican is 'silly' // MSNBC // Benjamin Landy - July 24, 2015

Self-professed "Star Trek" nerd and GOP presidential candidate Ted Cruz believes Captain Kirk was "quite likely" a Republican. And William Shatner, who starred as the character in the original 1960s hit television series, is having none of it.

"To put a geocentric label on interstellar characters is silly," Shatner tweeted Thursday after The New York Times Magazine published an interview with the Texas senator in which he offered "a little psychoanalysis" on why Kirk was probably a Republican and Jean-Luc Picard, the starship captain in "Star Trek: The Next Generation," was a Democrat.

"If you look at ''Star Trek: The Next Generation,' it basically split James T. Kirk into two people. Picard was Kirk's rational side, and William Riker was his passionate side. I prefer a complete captain. To be effective, you need both heart and mind," Cruz said, later comparing himself to his favorite character.

"The original 'Star Trek' was grittier," Cruz continued. "Kirk is working class; Picard is an aristocrat. Kirk is a passionate fighter for justice; Picard is a cerebral philosopher. The original 'Star Trek' pressed for racial equality, which was one of its best characteristics, but it did so without sermonizing."

Although "Star Trek" has been praised for its progressive outlook on racial and gender relations, which broke ground with a diverse cast, humanitarian plot lines and television's first interracial kiss, Shatner pushed back on any political reading.

"Star Trek wasn't political. I'm not political; I can't even vote in the US," tweeted the actor, who was born in Canada. At least he and Cruz have that in common.

Brent Bozell endorses Ted Cruz for president // MSNBC // Kelly O'Donnell - July 24, 2015

U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, today received the endorsement of Brent Bozell, conservative stalwart and president of the Conservative Victory Committee. Bozell released a video announcing his support of Sen. Cruz's candidacy for president.

"Make no mistake: If the Republican Party repeats what it has done the last two presidential elections, Republicans will lose. I guarantee it," Bozell said in the video. "On the other hand, if we nominate a principled, passionate conservative America can count on to restore her greatness, there will be an outpouring of support."

Bozell continues, "We need a courageous conservative who tells the truth and does what he promises. We need to nominate an inspiring leader who has proven he is willing to take on the Washington Cartel and buck the political establishment of both parties. We need a leader who will win, and reignite the promise of America. There are some good conservatives running for president, but we need more than a 'campaign conservative' – we need a consistent conservative who has led the fights important to us. Ted Cruz is this leader."

Brent Bozell III is one of the most outspoken and effective national leaders in the conservative movement today. He has spent more than three decades promoting and defending conservative values. He has built the largest media watchdog organization in the country, successfully exposing the mainstream media's biased coverage of conservative candidates and ideas. Additionally, he is founder of ForAmerica, an organization committed to restoring America to its founding principles with an online army of almost 8 million members, and previously served as president of the National Conservative Political Action Committee.

Cruz says he won't speak ill of Republicans, bashes McConnell // LA Times // Kathleen Hennessey - July 24, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz savaged Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, a fellow Republican, on the Senate floor Friday in a surprising screed about honesty, trust, loyalty and the export credit agency known as the Ex-Im Bank.

Cruz's speech dived deeply into Senate deal-making gone sideways, and Cruz, who is seeking the Republican nomination for president, made it clear he feels burned by his colleague and party leader.

He accused McConnell of lying to him, of bowing to the "Washington cartel of the lobbyists on K street" and of being no more trustworthy than the man who preceded McConnell, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, a Democrat.

"It saddens me to say this. ... I cannot believe he would tell a flat-out lie, and I voted based on those assurances that he made to each and every one of us," Cruz said.

"What we just saw today was an absolute demonstration that not only what he told every Republican senator, but what he told the press over and over and over again, was a simple lie."

Calling another senator a liar on the Senate floor is a remarkable breach of decorum in an institution that likes its dusty traditions. But it's even more remarkable given what Cruz had to say less than a week ago about speaking ill of his fellow Republicans.

When asked Saturday whether he would condemn Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump for comments casting Mexican immigrants as "rapists" and saying Sen. John McCain was "not a war hero," Cruz demurred and declared he'd take the high road.

"Folks in the press love to see Republican-on-Republican violence, and so you want me to say something bad about Donald Trump, or bad about John McCain or bad about anyone else," he said. "I'm not going to do it."

Cruz's decision to blast McConnell and take a pass on Trump fits with his political positioning in the Senate and in the race for the nomination. The Texas conservative is aiming to make a name for himself as the rabble-rousing outsider in the race. But it's hard for Cruz to one-up Trump in the rabble-rousing outsider category. So he has essentially decided to join him, rather than try to beat him. In the Senate, Cruz has less competition. On Friday, he had the floor.

"There is a profound disappointment among the American people because we keep winning elections and then we keep getting leaders who don't do anything they promised," Cruz said.

Ted Cruz Blasts Big Money In Politics // HuffPo // Paul Blumenthal - July 24, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) launched into a tirade on the corrupting role of lobbyists and campaign contributions in Washington during a Senate floor debate Friday about the reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank.

“It’s not that this majority gets things done,” Cruz said. “It does get things done, but it listens to one and only one voice. That is the voice of the Washington cartel of the lobbyists on K Street of the big money and big corporations.”

Cruz’s comments came amid debate over the reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank, a federal agency that provides credit to corporations to finance and insure foreign purchases. The largest recipient of the bank's support is the giant aerospace corporation Boeing.

The bank is the target of a massive campaign by libertarian-minded groups like Heritage Action and the billionaire Koch brothers’ Americans for Prosperity and Freedom Partners . Support for the bank has been funded by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the nation’s largest corporate lobby. The standoff has been billed as major battle between the tea party wing and the corporate wing of the Republican Party.

The bank’s authority lapsed in June, as Congress declined to approve it.

What sparked the Texas senator and Republican presidential candidate's tirade Friday was Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell's announcement that he would allow two amendments to a transportation funding bill: one to repeal Obamacare and another to reauthorize the Export-Import Bank.

Cruz said on the floor that McConnell lied to him and other Republicans when he sought support to provide President Barack Obama with fast-track trade authority to negotiate the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a trade agreement the U.S. is negotiating with Pacific nations. According to Cruz, McConnell promised that he would not allow any amendments to reauthorize the bank.

In response to the amendment, Cruz took issue with money in politics, with targets ranging from McConnell to Senate Democrats:

“Every Democrat who rails against big money and corruption in Washington, every Democrat who styles himself or herself a populist -- their actions on this matter speak far louder than their words,” he said. “And when it comes to Republicans -- Republicans are also listening to K Street and the lobbyists. Why? It’s not complicated. The giant corporations that are getting special favors from the taxpayers hire army of lobbyists that write campaign checks after campaign checks -- and by the way, these checks go to both Democrats and Republicans. It is career politicians in both parties that are kept in office by looting the taxpayer to benefit wealthy powerful corporations.”

Cruz’s solution to big money in politics, however, may not exactly be conducive to reducing corporate control of Congress. In 2014, he introduced a bill to eliminate all limits on campaign donations to allow political candidates to raise unlimited sums from any source, whether a person, corporation or labor union. At least on that issue, Cruz, the Koch brothers and the Chamber of Commerce can all agree.

ed Cruz Is Really Fed Up With Mitch McConnell // HuffPo // Sam Levine - July 24, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) accused Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) of lying and railed against the Kentucky senator's leadership during a fiery speech on the Senate floor Friday morning.

Cruz, who is running for president, was angry that McConnell will not allow senators to attach amendments to a highway funding bill -- even though McConnell indicated in January that he would allow an open amendments process as majority leader.

McConnell said on Friday that he will only allow two amendments on the bill: one to repeal the Affordable Care Act, and one to reauthorize the Export-Import Bank, which guarantees loans for those who purchase American exports and is an institution that Cruz strongly opposes. The bank's authority expired on June 30.

The Texas senator said that McConnell had previously told him that no deal had been struck to reauthorize the bank when the Senate was considering the Iran Review Act and whether to grant President Barack Obama Trade Promotion Authority.

"I cannot believe he would tell a flat-out lie," Cruz said.

Cruz also accused McConnell of running the Senate like Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) did when Democrats controlled the upper chamber.

"This Senate operates exactly the same," he said. "We keep winning elections, and we keep getting leaders who don't do anything they promise."

The exchange caught the eye of Reid spokesman Adam Jentleson, who sent an email to reporters saying that Cruz's speech helped explain a Pew poll showing that Republican favorability has dipped while Democratic favorability has remained more stable since the GOP took control of the Senate in January.

Cruz also called McConnell out for allowing a vote to repeal Obama's health care law, which the Texas senator has vowed to reverse if he is elected president. On Friday, he said that McConnell's amendment was "empty showmanship."

"We'll have a vote on repealing Obamacare. The Republicans will all vote yes, the Democrats will all vote no. ... It will be an exercise of meaningless political theatre."

Clarification: This story has been updated to indicate that McConnell said in January he would allow an open amendments process for bills in the Senate without referring to a specific bill.

Mitch McConnell's Move Leaves Ted Cruz Out In The Hallway // HuffPo // Ali Watkins and Akbar Shahid Ahmed - July 24, 2015

Senior lawmakers and staff from the House and Senate armed services committees are hammering away on the National Defense Authorization Act, the annual bill that keeps the military up and running. But there are fewer chairs at the negotiating table this time. And committee member and presidential candidate Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) isn't in one of them.

GOP leadership was worried that the notorious grandstander would tank the crucial spending bill, two sources familiar with the process told HuffPost. In an effort to keep him out of the room, they cut the membership of the conference committee -- the panel responsible for hammering out differences between the House and Senate versions of the bill -- to a smaller number than it's been in years.

"The number of Senate conferees was cut from previous years. Typically, all members of the [Senate Armed Services Committee] are named as the Senate conferees, but that is not the case this year," said one congressional source familiar with the process.

Both sources said they were told the conference panel was slashed in an effort to keep Cruz out of the room.

Instead of naming the entire Senate panel, the choice of this year's conferees lacks a clear formula. It consists of the committee leadership, plus several chairs and ranking members of the subcommittees. Sens. Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.) and Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) are also on the conference panel.

Cruz sponsored several amendments in the Senate's version of the NDAA, including requirements for reporting on the military capabilities of U.S. adversaries. But that didn't get him a seat at the table.

The firebrand senator is infamous for showy political maneuvers that often have far less to do with actual legislative objectives and far more to do with the interests of Ted Cruz. He's chosen several hills through his senatorial career to die on -- Obamacare is his weapon of choice, and he led a government shutdown over it in 2013. More recently, he embarked on a 21-hour filibuster over the Affordable Care Act that served little purpose besides further bogging down the already bogged-down Senate and providing the masses with his Darth Vader impression.

But the motive for boxing Cruz out of the end stages of the NDAA process isn't entirely clear. After all, bombastic freshman Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) landed an appointment. Cruz voted against the bill when it passed the Senate last month, but so did several other committee members who were eventually appointed to the conference panel.

"You'd have to ask Senator McConnell. That was his decision," Armed Services Committee Chair John McCain (R-Ariz.) said, adding that the conference process was ongoing.

There's certainly no love lost between Cruz and Mitch McConnell, the Senate majority leader. On Friday, Cruz took to the Senate floor to, among other things, call McConnell a liar.

"I cannot believe he would tell a flat-out lie, and I voted based on those assurances that he made to each and every one of us," Cruz said. He was referring to a supposed promise that McConnell made to Cruz and his Republican colleagues on a vote regarding a controversial export system.

McConnell has thrown his own jabs at the presidential hopeful, joking earlier this year about Cruz's threats to throw himself in front of a train to stop Obamacare.

"That idea has some merit to it," McConnell said at a dinner in January.

The offices of both Cruz and McConnell did not respond to requests for comment.

Ted Cruz Exploits Americans Trapped In Iran To Score Political Points Against Obama // HuffPo // Akbar Shahid Ahmed - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) on Thursday used the plight of four Americans trapped in Iran to launch a political attack on the Obama administration for its efforts to negotiate a limit to Iran's nuclear program.

But in doing so, the senator and presidential candidate did more than reduce the captives' suffering to political grandstanding. Cruz also conveniently ignored the fact that the captive Americans' own families hold views on the Iran negotiations that differ starkly from his own hawkish stance. The families have stated that they are generally optimistic that the nuclear deal recently negotiated between Iran and six world powers will help their loved ones come home.

"Signing a deal that sends millions of dollars to jihadists that want to murder us, that facilitates and accelerates Iran's acquiring nuclear weapons to murder us, and that abandons four American hostages in Iran is profoundly dangerous," Cruz said Thursday, speaking at a rally organized by conservative groups that oppose the nuclear deal.

Cruz went on to compare President Barack Obama with former President Jimmy Carter, who was president in 1979 when Iran took a number of U.S. hostages following a raid on the U.S. embassy in Tehran.

"There is nothing more pressing right now than that Americans all across this country come together to stop this catastrophic Iran nuclear deal," the Texas senator said.

The rally where Cruz spoke was put together by the advocacy arm of the conservative group Concerned Women for America, which has asked Congress not to back the nuclear deal, and the pro-Israel think tank Endowment for Middle East Truth, whose founder and president called the deal "appeasement, bordering on capitulation, bordering on treason."

The Americans being held in Iran include three Iranian-Americans who are known to be in jail: Pastor Saeed Abedini, former U.S. Marine Amir Hekmati and Washington Post Tehran correspondent Jason Rezaian. All three are charged with various breaches of state security, and securing their freedom will require working through Iran's opaque judicial system. In addition, former FBI agent Robert Levinson disappeared in Iran eight years ago and his whereabouts have been unknown since. He is believed to be held in retaliation for his work in Iran on behalf of the CIA.

Citing the cases of the four hostages has become a favored tactic of opponents of the nuclear agreement. The deal subjects Iran to strict restrictions on its nuclear program in exchange for relief from certain stringent economic sanctions. However, it does not cover the question of the Americans being held in Iran, though the Obama administration has said repeatedly that U.S. negotiators raised the matter each time they met with their Iranian counterparts.

Secretary of State John Kerry, Treasury Secretary Jacob Lew and Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz testify during a hearing on Iran before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The families of the four Americans have been deliberate but cautious in their activism, raising the captives' profiles but remaining careful not to insult Iran or alienate its elites. Family members and other advocates for the captives have largely supported the nuclear talks, believing that an agreement makes freedom more likely for the Americans.

"We are optimistic that the Iranian government will deliver on their promise to help find my father and send him home to show America, and the world, that they are serious about their peaceful intentions," Sarah Moriarty, one of Levinson's daughters, wrote in a HuffPost blog post last week. "My family has watched intently as our country went from absolutely no relations with Iran to this very promising open and direct dialogue. We truly believe this is the beginning of more fruitful discussions to come, and that it will unlock any remaining challenges our countries have in order to get my father home."

On the day that the deal was announced, Hekmati's family told HuffPost in a statement that they hoped the 31-year-old's release might become easier now that the U.S. and Iran had proven themselves committed to peace.

Ali Rezaian, the brother of the Washington Post reporter, remained supportive of the deal in remarks on Wednesday -- even as he criticized the Obama administration for failing to show Iran it would face consequences for arbitrarily imprisoning an American reporter. Rezaian conceded that it would have been "problematic" to expect the deal to be tied directly to the Americans' release.

Saeed Abedini's wife Naghmeh has made the same argument. Last week, she told CNN "it makes sense" that the captives were not immediately released upon the deal's announcement.

Unlike Cruz, Abedini declined to blame the White House for her husband's continued imprisonment. "I was hoping to hear some good news but I do think as the president said, he does care, he's concerned and they're working on it," she said.

Levinson's family declined to comment about Cruz's remarks. The families of Hekmati and Rezaian and a representative for Abedini's family did not respond to a request for comment.

Of the four hostages, only Abedini was represented in any sense at Thursday's rally. Tiffany Barrans, an attorney from the American Center for Law and Justice, a conservative group championing Abedini's case, spoke after Cruz. Abedini's family is the only one of the four that is not outwardly supportive of the deal.

Barrans told The Huffington Post the pastor's family did not want to weigh in on the specifics of the deal -- whether, for instance, they felt it suitably regulated the Iranian nuclear program. Instead, she said, Naghmeh Abedini would like lawmakers to remember her husband's case while considering the deal and to vote against it if he remains imprisoned by the deadline for congressional review. If Abedini is released by then, Barrans added, his family would be happy for lawmakers to review the deal simply on its own merits.

From left, Ali Rezaian, Naghmeh Abedini, Sarah Hekmati and Daniel Levinson testify on Capitol Hill. All four witnesses have family members who have been detained in Iran.

Cruz's attempt to politicize the Americans' cases was met with disdain by analysts and advocates who are following the issue.

"To make it an issue to go after the administration on in a campaign is unfair to the families, is unfair to the prisoners," said Haleh Esfandiari, the director emeritus of the Middle East Program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington.

Esfandiari herself was held for 105 days in Iran under suspicion of trying to foment regime change, and said her disapproval of Cruz's comments was tied to her own experience. "I remember when I was in prison, my family did all they could to keep it out of partisan politics," she said. "It hurts the prisoners. it doesn't help."

Rep. Dan Kildee (D-Mich.), Hekmati's congressman, sponsored a bipartisan congressional resolution last month calling for Iran to release the Americans. He told HuffPost on Thursday that he believes that Congress, which will soon vote on whether or not to approve the agreement, should consider the deal on its merits -- that is, as an attempt to limit Iran's nuclear capacity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"To imply that there was some failure in the negotiation, if that is [Cruz's] implication, that's not consistent with the interests of these Americans, it's not consistent with the wishes of the American that I represent being held in Iran," Kildee said. "It's a very dangerous thing for politicians to put their own political fortunes ahead of those interests."

He noted that the Americans being held in Iran would face greater uncertainty were the nuclear negotiations to fail. "The fate of these American would be far less within any control of the outside world if we further isolated Iran," Kildee said.

At Thursday's rally, HuffPost asked Cruz how he would respond to the captives' families who advocate more peaceful approach to Iran. In response, the senator reverted to his main talking point: the alleged failure of the Obama administration.

Cruz argued that Obama's team had proven willing to lift sanctions against a top Iranian general involved in killing Americans in Iraq yet "could not demonstrate the same willingness to bring home our four American hostages."

"We need a president who will stand with Americans and defend Americans, and unfortunately this president and this administration are not doing that," he said.

When asked what approach he would take to bringing the captives home, Cruz did not respond.

Chris Christie Makes Big Advertising Splash on Fox News // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters - July 24, 2015

In the race to crack the top 10 threshold that will determine which candidates can be in the first Republican presidential debate Aug. 6 on Fox News, there is more than one approach to getting your poll numbers up.

Some, like Carly Fiorina and former Senator Rick Santorum, have been seeking as much free media attention as they can, making the rounds on cable television and talk radio. Others, like Senator Marco Rubio and Senator Rand Paul, have made the news by sparring with Secretary of State John Kerry over the Iran nuclear deal.

Or, you could also try to buy your way to a higher standing in the polls. Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, in essence, is trying to do just that. His campaign has purchased $250,000 of advertising time — on Fox News.

The ad buy starts on Friday and goes through Aug. 9. Because Fox will use the candidates' standing in national polls to whittle down a field of 16 Republican candidates, the exposure that comes from a national cable television buy is extremely valuable.

And while Mr. Christie's standing in the top 10 is fairly sturdy — but not guaranteed — this ad buy is aimed to help buttress his standing.

New Jersey Gov. Christie blames Amtrak for nightmarish commutes // Reuters // Hilary Russ - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, a 2016 Republican presidential candidate, on Friday blamed Amtrak for a week of nightmarish commutes to and from New York and called on the Obama administration and Congress to "step up their responsibility," and fix the problems.

New Jersey pays Amtrak, the national rail operator, $100 million annually so that NJ Transit trains can use Amtrak tunnels and rails, Christie said.

Travelers using NJ Transit trains were "victimized" by extreme delays and cancellations throughout the system this week because of "Amtrak's indifference to New Jersey commuters and its abject neglect of the infrastructure that New Jersey and our entire region relies upon," Christie said in a statement.

Christie said he had asked the state attorney general to review the matter.

Amtrak apologized for the delays.

"We are actively sharing information with our partners at New Jersey Transit and other agencies and will continue to work closely with them in developing an immediate solution," spokeswoman Kimberly Woods said in a statement.

She said the power failures that caused problems on the Northeast Corridor this week showed the "urgent need for a funding solution."

Christie's broader record on transportation is less supportive. Just after taking office in 2010, he cancelled a new Hudson River tunnel project already under construction, called Access to the Region's Core, saying costs were likely to skyrocket and citing his state's lack of funding ability.

New Jersey's Transportation Trust Fund, which pays for roads and bridges, is also nearly broke. That has prompted calls from Democrats to raise the state's gas tax, which Christie has rejected.

New Jersey Assembly Transportation Committee Chairman John Wisniewski called Christie's comments about Amtrak hypocritical.

"His piece-meal approach and lack of long-term planning has left our roads and bridges in shambles," Wisniewski said in a statement.

Christie's cancellation of the tunnel project also "left New Jersey's trans-Hudson commuters with no choice but to endure Amtrak's delays, a problem that will only be exacerbated as the existing tunnels reach their expected lifespan and must be closed for improvements," he said.

Christie forgets: some Reagan references don't work // MSNBC // Steve Benen - July 24, 2015

Chris Christie's presidential campaign has a new television ad, which may not work quite as well as the Republican governor's team intended. Here's the transcript:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"President Obama gave away the store to the Iranians, to a group of people who since 1979 have been chanting 'death to America.' This was negotiated so badly that you wouldn't let this president buy a car for you at a car dealership.

"Now, he's lying to the American people about how the deal's going to work. I would've walked away from the table. That's what Ronald Reagan did when he walked away from Mikhail Gorbachev in Reykjavik.

"And so as president, the top priority is to protect the United States of America, and I'm the only one in this race who's had at least some small part of that responsibility. I'm Chris Christie and I approve this message."

The whole idea behind the ad is odd, in a candidate-focuses-on-his-weakness sort of way. Christie has no meaningful background in foreign policy or national security, and he's struggled at times to understand the basics, so for the governor to pretend this is his area of expertise is jarring.

For that matter, if the scandal-plagued Republican has any evidence of the president "lying to the American people about how the deal's going to work," Christie hasn't shared his proof with anyone.

But that's not the funny part.

Rather, what jumped out at me was Christie's willingness to get a gratuitous Reagan reference into the ad about U.S. policy towards Iran.

Um, gov? The Reagan White House illegally tried to sell weapons to Iran in order to help finance an illegal war in Central America. It was one of the biggest scandals in American history. Much of Reagan's national-security team ended up under indictment.

Sure, I realize Christie was talking about Reagan's nuclear talks with the USSR (which, incidentally, the right opposed and was also proven wrong about). But when going after Obama's approach to Iran, Republicans really ought to leave the Reagan example out of their talking points.

Time for some traffic problems under the Hudson River // MSNBC // Steve Benen - July 24, 2015

By most measures, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's ongoing "Bridgegate" scandal has done severe and lasting damage to his Republican presidential campaign. But his aides' decision to deliberately paralyze Fort Lee for political reasons isn't the governor's only problem related to transportation.

The New York Times reported yesterday, for example, on an even more immediate challenge.

For the third day in a row, electrical problems in century-old rail tunnels under the Hudson River on Wednesday stymied the commutes of tens of thousands of New Jersey Transit riders, illustrating again the shortcomings of the region's languishing infrastructure system.

The delays, coming a week after the board of New Jersey Transit approved a major fare increase, created chaos during the morning rush and gave rise to another round of questions about Gov. Chris Christie's decision five years ago to halt construction of a new rail tunnel.

In the scandal surrounding the George Washington Bridge lane-closures, the controversy is focused on Christie's team abusing its powers to a criminal degree. The problems in the tunnels under the Hudson River – part of the "busiest railroad corridor in the United States" – have nothing to do with Christie's team conspiring in secret to exact partisan revenge and everything to do with the governor showing poor judgment.

Revisiting our previous coverage, Christie made a bizarre decision in 2010, killing a project called Access to the Region's Core, "a years-in-the-making effort to build a new rail tunnel from New Jersey to New York City. Proponents of the project say it could have created as many as 44,000 jobs in and around the state and hiked local property values by up to $18 billion. A recent report from the office of New York Governor Andrew Cuomo even suggests that an additional tunnel under the Hudson River connecting New Jersey and New York could make regional infrastructure more resilient in the face of disasters like Hurricane Sandy."

I remember following Paul Krugman's coverage of this closely at the time. At one point, he wrote, "At some visceral level, I guess I was expecting Christie to back down at the last minute – expecting that there would be a still, small voice in his mind saying, 'If we can't do even this – if we can't follow through on a project so obviously needed, so clearly in the interests of the state and the nation – what hope is there for America?' But no. He went ahead and killed the tunnel."

Indeed, the governor killed the tunnel for reasons he struggled to explain, after millions of dollars of infrastructure investment had already been spent.

Had Christie shown better judgment, the overhaul project very likely would have been finished by now. Instead, conditions continue to get worse.

This helps add some context to the message of the governor's presidential campaign: Christie is effectively running on his personality because his record in office is a subject that's incredibly difficult to defend.

PERRY

One of Two Charges Against Rick Perry Is Dismissed // NYT // Alan Rappeport - July 24, 2015

Former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, who is seeking the Republican nomination for president, received some good news regarding his legal problems on Friday when an appeals court in his state dropped one of the two felony charges he is facing.

Mr. Perry was indicted last summer on criminal charges of abuse of power and coercion of a public servant. The case surrounds an episode during which Mr. Perry was accused of trying to use his powers as governor to make an elected official step down after being charged with drunken driving.

The case has been a nuisance for Mr. Perry as he looks to gain traction in a crowded field of Republicans seeking the party's presidential nomination.

On Friday, the Austin court dismissed the coercion of a public servant charge against Mr. Perry on the grounds that violates his right to free speech under the First Amendment.

"Because the First Amendment bars enforcement of the statute on which the "coercion of a public servant" charge is based, that charge must be dismissed," Judge Bert Richardson wrote in an opinion.

The coercion charge would have carried a prison sentence of two to 10 years. Mr. Perry still faces the more serious abuse of official capacity charge, which carries a prison sentence of five to 99 years.

Critics of Mr. Perry argue that he overstepped his authority following the 2013 arrest of Rosemary Lehmberg, the district attorney in Travis County, who is a Democrat. He threatened to veto $7.5 million in state funding for the public corruption unit in her office unless she resigned.

When she would not resign, Mr. Perry followed through, vetoing the money and saying that he could not support "continued state funding for an office with statewide jurisdiction at a time when the person charged with ultimate responsibility of that unit has lost the public's confidence."

Mr. Perry, the first Texas governor in nearly 100 years to face criminal charges, has denied any wrongdoing and on Friday applauded the ruling. His lawyers have argued that the remaining charge should be considered a misdemeanor and that a veto in the absence of bribery cannot be illegal.

"The remaining charge is hanging by a thread, and we are confident that once it is put before the court, it will be dismissed on its face," said Tony Buzbee, lead counsel for Mr. Perry.

Michael McCrum, the special prosecutor who has brought the case against Mr. Perry, was not immediately available to comment on the dismissal of the charge.

Mr. Perry chose not to run for another term as governor of Texas, stepping aside in January after a 14 year reign to focus on his second White House bid.

Despite the controversy, Mr. Perry's Republican rivals have been cordial about the case and have not used it against him. This year, Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin and Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana panned the accusations and defended Mr. Perry's character.

Texas Court Dismisses One Charge Against Perry While Upholding Another // WSJ // Nathan Koppel - July 24, 2015

Lawyers for former Texas Gov. Rick Perry persuaded an appeals court Friday to whittle down criminal charges that he abused his power while in office, but the court ruled that part of the case can still go forward, complicating his prospects as he runs for president.

The Third Court of Appeals in Austin ruled in favor of dismissing one felony count against the governor for alleged "coercion of a public servant" in connection with a veto he issued in 2013 as governor. The appellate court ruled the Texas coercion statute was a violation of constitutional free-speech protections.

But the appellate court ruled against dismissing a second felony charge, "abuse of official capacity," and sent the case back to a trial court in Austin to resolve the charge.

The upshot is that the 2014 indictment against Mr. Perry, issued by a grand jury in Austin, will continue to hang over him as he tries to gain ground in the crowded Republican nominating contest for president.

Tony Buzbee, lead counsel for Mr. Perry, cast the ruling as a victory. "The appeals court made clear that this case was questionable," he said. "The remaining charge is hanging by a thread, and we are confident that once it is put before the court, it will be dismissed on its face."

The case stems from an allegation that Mr. Perry improperly threatened to veto $7.5 million in funding for a prosecutorial unit headed by Travis County District Attorney Rosemary Lehmberg if she didn't resign following an arrest for drunken driving. Travis County includes Austin, the state capital.

Ms. Lehmberg, an elected Democrat, declined to quit, and Mr. Perry carried out the veto.

Mr. Perry has long denied wrongdoing, claiming the criminal charges were politically motivated.

Michael McCrum, the special prosecutor in the case, didn't immediately return a call for comment about the appellate ruling.

Craig McDonald, the director of Texans for Public Justice, a nonprofit, liberal advocacy group that filed a complaint about the veto that ultimately gave rise to the criminal case, said he was pleased the case would continue to move forward.

"The fact that one potential felony indictment is in place is significant," he said.

Appeals court drops one felony charge against Rick Perry // Politico // Adam B. Lerner - July 24, 2015

An appeals court in Texas had dismissed one of two felony charges pending against former Gov. Rick Perry.

A grand jury indicted Perry last August on one count of abusing his office and one count of coercing a public servant for allegedly trying to push a local Democratic district attorney to resign by threatening to withhold state funds from her office.

Prosecutors claim that Perry tried to use his veto power to force Rosemary Lehmberg, the Travis County district attorney, to leave office after she was arrested for driving while intoxicated. Lehmberg's office in Austin oversees public corruption investigations, including into officials in the Texas state government and the federal government.

The appeals court dropped the coercion of a public servant indictment, citing the Texas Republican's right to free speech.

"The statute on which the 'coercion of a public servant' is based, as written, and as we are bound to construe it, violates the First Amendment and, accordingly, cannot be enforced," wrote Texas Court of Appeals Judge Bert Richardson.

The charge would have entailed a prison term of between two and 10 years, while the remaining abuse of his official government position charge could carry between five and 99 years, according to the New York Times.

The former Texas governor, a 2016 Republican candidate for president, has repeatedly proclaimed his innocence.

The lead attorney for Perry's team, Tony Buzbee, said in a statement that Friday's decision "is a clear step towards victory for the rule of law."

"The only remaining count we believe to be a misdemeanor, and the only issue is whether the governor's veto — or any veto in the absence of bribery — can ever be illegal. The appeals court made clear that this case was questionable," he added.

"The remaining charge is hanging on by a thread, and we are confident that once it is put before the court, it will be dismissed on its face."

Texas appeals court tosses one count against former Governor Perry // Reuters // Jim Forsyth - July 24, 2015

A Texas state appeals court on Friday dismissed one of two felony counts in an abuse-of-power case against former Governor Rick Perry stemming from a 2013 veto by the now-presidential candidate.

The Texas Third Court of Appeals in Austin threw out a count of coercion of a public official, saying it violated Perry's right to free speech. However, the court let stand an abuse of official capacity charge.

In a 97-page opinion, the court said the statute on which the "coercion of a public servant" violates the First Amendment and cannot be enforced.

Perry was indicted in August by a grand jury in Travis County, a Democratic stronghold in a heavily Republican state, with abuse of official capacity, a first-degree felony, and coercion of a public official, a third-degree felony.

If convicted of a first-degree felony, he could face from five to 99 years in prison.

The charges relate to what many see as a threat by Perry in 2013 to veto $7.5 million in funding for an integrity unit in the Travis County District Attorney's office. Many said Perry played hardball politics to force out county District Attorney Rosemary Lehmberg, a Democrat, after she pleaded guilty to drunken driving.

Since Lehmberg is an elected official in a different branch of government from Perry, the grand jury said his actions amounted to illegally attempting to use his office to influence the behavior of another elected official.

The abuse of official capacity count claims that by vetoing funding for Lehmberg's office, Perry engaged in what amounted to misuse of government property.

"One down and one to go," Tony Buzbee, Perry's lead attorney, told Reuters after Friday's ruling. "We believe the only remaining count is a misdemeanor and raises the question of whether the exercise of a veto can ever be illegal in the absence of bribery.

"This thing is hanging by a thread and, in my view, is very near to being over," Buzbee said.

The former governor has said he acted within the powers granted to him under the Texas Constitution.

Perry entered the 2016 Republican presidential campaign in June. He had sought the party's nomination in 2012 but dropped out after a series of gaffes.

The case has political overtones because Texas Republicans have long complained that the Public Integrity Unit is used by officials of overwhelmingly Democratic Travis County to harass and intimidate Republican elected officials.

Rick Perry.

The court agreed with the argument from Perry's legal team that a Texas law concerning "coercion of a public servant" violated Perry's First Amendment freedom of speech rights. It did, however, allow a charge related to abuse of power, to move forward.

"The statute on which the 'coercion of a public servant' is based, as written, and as we are bound to construe it, violates the First Amendment and, accordingly, cannot be enforced," the appeals court ruled according to the Austin American-Statesman.

Perry is accused of threatening to veto funding the Travis County Public Integrity Unit unless a district attorney, who received a drunken driving conviction, resigned.

The attorney did not resign, so Perry vetoed the funding.

"The Americans in this country are looking for a president that will stand up and do what's right and that's exactly what Perry did," said Tony Buzbee, lead counsel for Perry.

Texans for Rick Perry released a statement calling the ruling a clear step towards having the second charge, a misdemeanor, dismissed.

"We believe once we put that issue in the front of the Court of Appeals, they will throw it out on their face and Governor Perry will go on about his business," Buzbee said.

Rick Perry Now Has One Less Problem In His Run For President // HuffPo // Jacob Kerr - July 24, 2015

A Texas court of appeals has tossed out one of the criminal charges against Republican presidential candidate Rick Perry, which arose from a 2013 veto he made as governor.

According to the Austin American-Statesman, the court determined the "coercion of a public servant" count against Perry violated his right to freedom of speech under the First Amendment. The court allowed an "abuse of official capacity" count to continue.

“The only remaining count we believe to be a misdemeanor, and the only issue is whether the governor’s veto – or any veto in the absence of bribery – can ever be illegal,” lawyer Tony Buzbee said in a statement. “The appeals court made clear that this case was questionable. The remaining charge is hanging by a thread, and we are confident that once it is put before the court, it will be dismissed on its face.”

The case concerns a line-item veto Perry made in 2013, which cut $7.5 million from the state's public integrity unit. Perry reportedly threatened to veto the funding unless Travis County District Attorney Rosemary Lehmberg, a Democrat whose office oversees the unit, resigned because of a DWI conviction she received. When Lehmberg refused, Perry followed through and cut the funding.

An ethics complaint was subsequently filed against Perry and a grand jury indicted him on the two counts last year.

"I'm going to enter this courthouse with my head held high knowing the actions that I took were not only lawful and legal, but right," Perry said when he turned himself in for his mugshot in August 2014.

Despite the efforts of Perry's legal team, this is the first time a court has thrown out one of the charges.

Perry left the governor's office after his third full term ended in January and announced his second bid for the White House last month.

SANTORUM

Rick Santorum joins fray in N.H. // Boston Globe // Akilah Johnson - July 24, 2015

Former US senator Rick Santorum, a Republican running for president, tried to position himself as someone outside of political establishment on Friday, taking swipes at both political parties on immigration and national security.

“We need someone who understands the threats that are facing the American country and has the courage to tell the American people the truth,” Santorum, one of 21 White House hopefuls — 16 Republicans and five Democrats — told a crowd of about 50 people inside a storefront campus of New England College.

Santorum’s visit marked one of the socially conservative Pennsylvanian’s rare trips to the Granite State, where GOP primary voters tend to focus more on fiscal issues. In his remarks Friday, Santorum concentrated on foreign policy and other domestic issues.

Cyber attacks by Russia and China are threatening America’s digital information, he said. Diplomatic relations with Cuba have aligned the country with a nation that, along with Venezuela, has “systematically turned almost every single Central and South American country against the United States,” Santorum said.

But the biggest threat to the United States, according to Santroum, is Iran, a country he said practices a “radical” form of Islam that is preparing to play out its version of an Armageddon story. He called President George W. Bush “a good man,” but said his “War on Terror” was a “misnomer,” as Iraq was not our biggest threat.

“And this is the country we’re giving an on-ramp for nuclear weapons,” he said, referring to the Iranian nuclear agreement, which is also supported by five other world powers. The deal prevents Iran from building a nuclear weapon for 15 years, by limiting uranium enrichment and allowing for international inspections of suspected processing sites, in exchange for the lifting of harsh economic sanctions.

“This is the worst, most dangerous agreement that any president has ever entered into,” he said. “We have a media that is just silent, and the Republican Party — and US Senate — that has been feckless at best. Anybody who doesn’t stand up to this president, you now own Iran. You are partners with everything Iran does heretofore.”

The 57-year-old won the Iowa caucuses in his unsuccessful run for president in 2012. A religious conservative, Santorum spent much more time in Iowa than New Hampshire, more than double, during the last presidential election cycle.

But at Friday afternoon’s town hall meeting, which was sponsored by the Merrimack County Republican

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Committee, Santorum acknowledged the importance of the New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary, saying he plans to do "a whole series of town halls meetings in the next few days."

This is only Santorum's third trip to the state since his 2012 bid for president. At the end of this two-day swing through New Hampshire, Santorum will have spent four days there, compared with 31 days in Iowa this year.

Santorum spoke for more than an hour on Friday, taking nearly a dozen questions on everything from immigration to contraception to entitlement programs. On immigration, Santorum said politicians have gotten away from doing what's in the best interest of the country, focusing instead on their political futures and personal riches.

Democrats, he said, "believe if these folks come, they will disproportionately vote for them. Republicans, in large part, are no better. They're not looking for votes, they're looking for cheap labor."

Santorum Walks Away From Porn-Busting Promise // US News // Steven Nelson - July 24, 2015

The last time he ran for president, former Sen. Rick Santorum aroused Internet users by promising to take away their access to pornography.

Federal law makes distribution of hardcore pornography illegal, he said in a statement on his 2012 campaign website. All that's required is a president who will "vigorously" enforce the ban, the Pennsylvania Republican said, pledging to do so.

"While the Obama Department of Justice seems to favor pornographers over children and families, that will change under a Santorum Administration," the statement proclaimed.

The pledge attracted intense discussion after Santorum emerged as Mitt Romney's most prominent rival for the GOP nomination. It was laughed off by pornographers but discussed seriously by legal experts, some of whom said a crackdown might succeed – albeit imperfectly without a grand national firewall – if juries find porn sites and consumers guilty of distributing or receiving "obscene" content.

But as the 2016 presidential race heats up, the reliable social conservative – running again – says he's forgotten his position on the issue, perhaps dooming it to increasing irrelevance after a two-decade lull in prosecutions that coincided with a boom in availability of Internet porn.

"I don't even remember that position to be very honest with you," Santorum said during a recent roundtable interview at U.S. News. "I wish I could say I was cognizant of everything that's on my website."

He added: "I'm not, candidly, familiar with the federal laws with respect to pornography. ... but all I would say is whatever the laws are, unlike this president I will enforce [them]."

Santorum and the more than dozen other Republicans running for president soon will be asked to stake a position on the issue by Patrick Trueman, a Reagan administration prosecutor who now leads the group National Center on Sexual Exploitation.

Trueman proudly participated in federal pornography prosecutions in the 1980s and during the last election cycle said that Romney's campaign, too, had promised to vigorously enforce obscenity laws, but that he suspected

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney “saw that Rick Santorum got beat up in the mainstream press for being so forthright” and elected not to advertise his position.

Trueman believes it would be fairly easy to win obscenity convictions for porn featuring consensual adult group sex, depictions of violence and unusual fetishes. Anything more salacious than waist-up female nudity would be eligible for conviction somewhere in the country, he told The Daily Caller during the last election.

It’s legal for individuals to possess pornography their neighbors may deem obscene, according to the Justice Department, but it’s technically illegal under many circumstances to distribute or receive it.

There’s reason to doubt any change to status quo nonenforcement of obscenity laws as they pertain to pornography featuring consenting adults. In addition to presumably shifting public opinion, the past three presidential administrations – including the Republican George W. Bush administration – showed no interest in cracking the whip.

Graham's fundraising puts him in middle of GOP pack // USA Today // Mary Troyan - July 24, 2015

Donors from Sen. Lindsey Graham's home state of South Carolina account for most of the money he's raised as a Republican presidential candidate, but he's also seeing support from outside the South.

Graham has raised $2.14 million from individual donors since January, according to his first Federal Election Commission report as a presidential candidate. Forty percent of that — about $864,000 — came from people in his home state.

But Graham, who formally announced his candidacy June 1, also hauled in $300,000 from California donors, $172,000 from New York, $73,000 from Massachusetts and $63,000 from Florida.

His FEC report, which covers checks written through the end of June, doesn't change his status as a long shot for the Republican nomination.

Graham's fundraising puts him in the middle of the GOP presidential pack. He's behind Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, former Florida governor Jeb Bush, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul. But he's raised more than former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, former Texas governor Rick Perry, former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former Pennsylvania senator Rick Santorum and former New York governor George Pataki.

National polls have Graham at less than 1%, too low to make the top 10 cut for the first national televised debate among GOP candidates. He polls much higher in South Carolina, site of the first Southern GOP presidential primary in early 2016.

In addition to the $2.14 million he's raised from individual donors, Graham transferred $1.52 million from his Senate campaign account. As of June 30, he had $2.58 million in campaign cash.

Greenville residents accounted for $163,000 in donations. Among them are Smyth McKissick III, CEO of Alice Manufacturing, $5,400; Michael Riordan, president and CEO of Greenville Hospital Systems, $5,300; Wallace Cheves, managing partner of Sky Boat Gaming, $2,600; and Clyde Selleck III, chairman of Michelin, $2,500.

About 144 people each gave $2,700, the maximum per election. Another 38 each gave $5,400, the maximum total for the primary and the general elections.

Other notable donors included John Cahill, CEO of Kraft Foods, $2,600; U.S. Rep. Tom Rice, R-Myrtle Beach, $1,000; Jim Albaugh, former CEO of Boeing, $2,600; Riley Bechtel, chairman of the board of Bechtel Group, $2,700; Oracle CEO Safra Catz, $2,700; Robert McNair, chairman and CEO of the Houston Texans, $2,700; David Pankau, chairman and CEO of Blue Cross/Blue Shield of South Carolina, $2,600; former U.S. secretary of State George Shultz, $5,400; and Thomas Kinder Jr., public announcer for the Cincinnati Bengals football team, $1,500.

Employees at the Nelson Mullins Riley & Scarborough law firm donated a total $25,800, and the firm's political action committee gave $5,000. One of the firm's partners, David Wilkins of Greenville, chaired Graham's initial exploratory committee. Wilkins is a former speaker of the South Carolina state House and was ambassador to Canada under former president George W. Bush. He also was South Carolina chairman of the Bush-Cheney campaign in 2004.

An unrelated pro-Graham super PAC, which can collect unlimited donations, is not required to release its first fundraising report until July 31.

Bobby Jindal on theater shooting: 'We will get through this' // CNN // Jedd Rosche - July 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal spoke from just outside a Lafayette movie theater after a deadly shooting took place there Thursday, saying he was "horrified and shocked."

"We will get through this," Jindal said outside the theater, while investigators were still examining the crime scene. "This is a unified community."

Jindal, who said he was in Baton Rouge about 45 minutes away when he was notified of the shooting, was flanked by local and state law enforcement at the 9:45 p.m. local time press conference.

Details were scarce following the incident, which took place at the Grand Theatre 16, as local law enforcement officials said at a briefing they were unsure of how many were wounded or if anyone, besides the shooter had been killed.

Vice president of the Acadian Ambulance Clay Henry told CNN's Don Lemon on Thursday that at least nine people were wounded and brought into local hospitals. Henry said he was aware of two people who had died, one of which included the shooter.

president last month, used his Twitter account to ask her followers for prayers for those involved in the incident.

"Prayers for Lafayette at Grand Theater. Talking to state police colonel about shooting in Lafayette," Jindal tweeted.

"I'm on my way to Lafayette right now. Please say a prayer for the victims at Grand Theatre and their families," Jindal tweeted about an hour after the 911 call came in regarding the shooting.

The shooting comes nearly three years after the deadly Aurora, Colorado shooting, that left 12 people dead at a movie theater in July.

Every Interview Bobby Jindal Gives Is The Same // BuzzFeed // Christopher Massie - July 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal is very, very, very good at staying on message.

In radio interviews — a common feature of Republican campaigning — Jindal has a set of talking points he delivers again, and again, and again.

In fact, Jindal is far and away the Republican presidential candidate who most consistently delivers or returns to his talking points, based on BuzzFeed News reporters who track presidential candidates daily and weekly interviews with radio and local television.

Jindal's favorite point is that Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton are turning "the American dream into the European nightmare." He has been making some version of this exact statement virtually every time he has done a radio interview on the campaign trail for the past two months.

Other points oft-repeated by Jindal are that America is on the "path to socialism," that he disagrees with Jeb Bush's statement that Republicans "need to lose the primary to win the general," and that Obama and Clinton are both "socialists," just like Bernie Sanders, "only Bernie's more honest about it."

Here are some examples of him repeating the same things over and over again:

TRUMP

Donald Trump Is With the GOP, for Now // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein - July 24, 2015

Visiting the nation's border with Mexico on Thursday, Donald Trump declared that he would win the Republican Party's 2016 presidential nomination but didn't rule out running as an independent candidate.

Mr. Trump has caused significant headaches for establishment Republicans by stealing the recent spotlight of the party's primary campaign. But he could make things far worse for the party by running as an independent or third-party presidential candidate, where he could siphon off some voters from the eventual Republican nominee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Look, I'm a Republican," Mr. Trump told some 100 journalists who traveled to the border at Laredo, Texas, for his nine-minute news conference, which was carried live by multiple cable television networks. "I'm a conservative. I'm running. I'm in first place by a lot, it seems, according to all the polls. I want to run as a Republican. I think I'll get the nomination. We'll see soon enough. I think I'll get the nomination."

But Mr. Trump hasn't ruled out taking his White House run independent. Last weekend in Ames, Iowa, he said he wouldn't rule out the possibility. And in an interview with the Hill newspaper published Thursday, Mr. Trump threatened to go on his own if he feels mistreated by the GOP, which has condemned his recent belittling of Sen. John McCain's war record.

"I'll have to see how I'm being treated by the Republicans," Mr. Trump said in the interview. "Absolutely, if they're not fair, that would be a factor."

The visit to the border was intended to highlight what has become a signature issue for the New York developer since he announced his run for president last month. During that announcement, Mr. Trump said Mexican immigrants crossing the border illegally are drug traffickers and "rapists," and he has vowed stricter immigration-control measures.

On Thursday, wearing a white baseball cap emblazoned with his campaign slogan, "Make America Great Again," Mr. Trump predicted that his comments about immigrants wouldn't damage his standing among Hispanic voters seen as critical to a Republican victory in 2016.

"I think I'll win the Hispanic vote," he said. "Over the years thousands and thousands of Hispanics have worked for me and now work for me."

Mr. Trump's rivals for the GOP nomination doubt that contention. Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry on Wednesday gave a speech in Washington attacking Mr. Trump in tones unusually aggressive for primary opponents. And on Thursday, former New York Gov. George Pataki said in an interview that Mr. Trump's presence in the primary would make it harder for the eventual GOP nominee to win support from Hispanics.

"He's not going to be president of the United States," Mr. Pataki said. "I just think it's unfortunate that so much of the media, so much of the dialogue is about someone like that as opposed to" the Iran deal, security at military recruiting centers and the nation's tax policies.

Mr. Trump has offered few specifics about his immigration policy beyond a pledge to build a fence along the southern border. When asked Thursday how he planned to deal with the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants already in the U.S., he dodged the question.

"We're going to have plenty of time to talk about it," Mr. Trump said.

Mr. Trump, as a Republican candidate for president and a billionaire who is nearly single-handedly financing himself, is running a hybrid operation that doesn't have to follow many of the rules imposed on his rivals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He can raise and spend unlimited sums of his own money on his campaign, and while other candidates can't coordinate their activity with the better-funded super PACs backing them, Mr. Trump as a self-funded candidate is in control of all of his money, a big chunk of which is being redirected into his own bank accounts.

Of the $1.4 million his campaign spent in the second quarter, at least 40% went to Trump-affiliated entities, disclosure reports filed last week with the Federal Election Commission show.

The campaign paid more than $500,000 to Tag Air, Inc., an airline owned by Mr. Trump. It also pays $10,000 a month in rent to Trump Towers and paid another $38,000 to reimburse the Trump Corp. for "facility, resources and domain names," according to the report.

Mr. Trump drew income of more than $5.1 million from Trump Corp. in 2014 and most of the first half of 2015, his personal financial disclosure on Wednesday showed.

Beyond how he is paying for administrative expenses, "there's the obvious advantage in being very involved and close to the messaging of the campaign and the strategic planning of the campaign," said Kenneth Gross, former head of enforcement at the Federal Election Commission.

Of the $1.9 million the campaign raised in the second quarter, $1.8 million, or 94%, came from Mr. Trump's own pocket. Mr. Trump's second-quarter campaign account fell short of what other GOP front runners, including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, raised for their candidacies. Mr. Bush collected $11.4 million, while Mr. Rubio garnered $12 million.

But should Mr. Trump, who is currently topping the field in polling of GOP primary voters, continue to pour millions into his campaign, he will be uniquely equipped to purchase campaign advertisements at lower cost, since candidates pay a reduced rate compared with outside groups, such as super PACs.

TV stations are required to give candidates the "lowest unit rate" in the 45 days before a primary election, and before that must still charge a reasonable rate. While other candidates are also entitled to the lowest rate, the majority of the funds backing their campaigns will likely land in the outside groups backing them.

Outside groups face prices driven by the market, and the supply-and-demand dynamics in such a crowded primary are certain to send advertising rates skyrocketing. Mr. Bush's allies estimated earlier this week that it would cost nearly $60 million just to run 10 days' worth of advertising in the first 30 primary states. The former Florida governor's super PAC has already raised $103 million-nearly 10 times as much as Mr. Bush's campaign took in.

An unlimited access to funds could also allow Mr. Trump to stay in the race far longer than other candidates, who may face fundraising constraints. Under federal law, individual donations to a candidate are capped at $2,700. Since Trump isn't relying on anyone else for money, that restriction is essentially meaningless. Mr. Trump did accept $100,000 in contributions in the second quarter, but doesn't appear to be actively soliciting outside cash.

"I don't need anybody's money....I don't care. I'm really rich," Mr. Trump said when he announced his candidacy. He has $300 million in cash and liquid assets, his campaign confirmed.

Corey Lewandowski, his campaign manager, said, "If he wanted, which he doesn't, he could have billions of dollars of cheap financing against his unlevered assets from banks overnight."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" on Friday, Mr. Trump criticized the rest of the presidential field as "controlled by the lobbyists and the special interests and their donors."

Mr. Trump also avoids the risk that his main backers will quit on him if he doesn't perform well in the early primaries. His rivals can't say as much. "He can remain viable as a Republican or even perhaps an independent candidate...for the duration," Mr. Gross said, adding that a self-funded candidate doesn't have to pander to the wishes of big donors. "If a candidate is self-financing, you get what you hear, whether you like it or not," he said. "At least you know they're not speaking on behalf of somebody else."

Still, there are perils to paying your own way. "Money helps get attention and be in the race," said Jan Baran, a campaign-finance lawyer at Wiley Rein. "Whether the candidate is able to stay in a race depends on the voters."

Self-financing a presidential campaign also hasn't proven a particularly effective tactic in past elections. In 1992, Texas billionaire Ross Perot campaigned as an independent, pouring more than $60 million of his own dollars into the effort. He ultimately won less than 20% of the popular vote.

Republican Mitt Romney lent $44 million to his 2008 campaign for his party's nomination, which he lost to Arizona Sen. John McCain. He didn't loan any personal funds to his next campaign in 2012, when he clinched the nomination but lost the general election.

Donald Trump loved and hated by Hispanics in border city // AP // Jill Colvin - July 24, 2015

There was an audible gasp from the gathered crowd as Donald Trump's 757 lifted off the tarmac.

"Oh my God. Wow," said Gina Gil, 48, after an excited shriek, reaching for her 11-year-old-nephew. "I think it's a historic moment, ma'am. Seriously, I really do."

Gil was referring to Trump's visit Thursday to Laredo, Texas, a small city on the U.S.-Mexico border where the Republican presidential candidate spent less than an hour touring the border, bragged to reporters about the danger he faced, proclaimed Hispanics love him, and stopped traffic with a presidential-sized motorcade.

Yet beyond the spectacle The Donald seems to create wherever he goes, the billionaire businessman's visit exposed evidence of a divided community whose overwhelmingly Hispanic population both decried Trump as racist and cheered his hardline immigration views. Interviews during and after the whirlwind tour with more than a dozen local residents underscored the danger Trump represents to the GOP's relationship with Hispanic voters and his appeal to a vocal segment of frustrated voters, many Hispanics among them, who see a glaring problem on the nation's southern border that requires attention.

Jessica Gonzalez, 79, a retired housewife who was born and raised in Laredo, said she'd watched as the city she'd grown up in had changed, with restaurants replaced with Mexican food and new people coming in.

"I think he's right," she said in the parking lot of a local CVS. "All we have is people from foreign countries. ... It's not like it used to be."

Gonzalez — a Democrat — and her husband used to travel across the border frequently to shop and for entertainment, but are now afraid to cross because of violence from the drug cartels.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I want to go down and say: Donald Trump, you're on fire in Laredo! Because everybody feels what you think!" she said.

Outside Obregon's Mexican Restaurant, Enrique Harrington Ramon, 75, said he felt Spanish-speaking immigrants "take advantage of us" in Laredo, and said people are responding to what Trump says "because it's the truth."

"I am sick of walking into a store and hearing 'en que le puede ayudar?' What country are we in?" he said.

Others in this growing city of about 250,000, where 95.6 percent of the population identified as Hispanic or Latino in 2010, lashed out at Trump, who described some Mexican immigrants in the country illegally as "rapists" and "criminals" during his announcement speech last month and has refused to apologize.

"I wish he wouldn't come down here," said Raul Gonzalez, 65, a retired trailer and truck mechanic who was born and raised in Laredo. "He's very disrespectful to Latinos."

Laredo-born Tony Flores, 82, who was wearing a cap that identified him as a Korean War veteran, said of Trump: "He is poisonous. He is hatred."

While Hispanic voters along the U.S.-Texas border have a unique perspective, the vast majority of the growing demographic supports more forgiving immigration policies that would allow a pathway to citizenship or permanent residency for immigrants in the country illegally, according to recent polls.

Trump, meanwhile, is viewed favorably by just 28 percent of Americans and unfavorably by 58 percent, according to an Associated Press-GfK poll conducted earlier in the month. About one-third of whites, but just 16 percent of Hispanics and 10 percent of blacks, have a favorable view of Trump.

At the airport, Patti Magnon, 43, who works for a law firm, said she brought her 6-year-old daughter to see Trump's custom plane, emblazoned with his name in big gold letters, land and then returned to watch him go.

"He's not wrong entirely. I'm from Laredo and I see the problems that we get," she said, noting that Mexican workers used to come across the border to work and return home afterward, but now don't want to leave.

"They get all the benefits that I can't get. I have to pay taxes," she complained.

Trump has appeared to tone down his immigration rhetoric in recent days. He stressed he's opposed to illegal immigration, not those immigrants who enter the country legally. And he noted that he has employed "tens of thousands" of immigrants over the years.

At least one Laredo resident tried to ignore Trump altogether.

"I don't think anything about him. He's not right for a president," said Joe Rodriguez, 50, a longtime Laredo resident who was born in Dallas. Rodriguez said he'd been invited to join a protest of Trump's visit but decided it wasn't worth his time.

"I said: 'Why? Don't protest. Don't show him any attention,'" he said.

Debating The Donald: GOP rivals preparing with caution // AP // Jill Colvin - July 24, 2015

Considered the ultimate wildcard, Donald Trump is complicating debate strategy for Republican presidential candidates now scrambling to prepare for their first face-to-face meeting on national television.

The billionaire businessman, who has dominated the 2016 Republican race in recent weeks, threatens to do the same when the top 10 GOP candidates — as determined by national polls — face off in less than two weeks. It's a high-risk, high-reward event for candidates eager to stand out yet wary to fall victim to one of Trump's notorious bombastic political attacks.

"It's the No. 1 unavoidability," said former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a 2012 GOP candidate who had a knack for standing out in debates four years ago.

"Do not try to match him in anger and in aggressiveness. It's not possible," Gingrich warned Trump's rivals. "He's a very instinctively aggressive guy, and if you try to dance with him on his strengths he'll run over you."

Despite his longshot status, the reality television star has commanded attention and seen his poll numbers rise after firing off provocative comments about immigrants, his presidential rivals and critics in both parties.

His supporters love him because he's willing to say what others only think. But that makes him dangerous in a debate setting, says Charlie Black, a leading GOP strategist who has worked on multiple presidential campaigns.

"Just try to ignore him," Black said. "The less attention you give him the better. I wouldn't even look at him."

That's easier said than done in a nationally televised program where Trump is sure to play a central role — literally, perhaps, if he's positioned at the center of the stage as the leader in recent polls.

Count former Texas Gov. Rick Perry as among the candidates eager for a showdown, although he may not qualify for the Aug. 6 meeting in Cleveland. Only the top 10 candidates in national polling will be allowed on stage. With 16 declared candidates, several high-profile Republicans will be left out. Perry is on the bubble.

"If Donald Trump wants to sit on the stage and talk about solutions, I'm going to be happy to have that conversation," Perry said on Fox News. "But if all he's going to do is throw invectives, then I'm going to push back and I'm going to push back hard."

Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky told The Associated Press that he's ready to be tested.

"You have to be able to stand your ground," Paul said, because politics is "somewhat of a body combat sport."

Even without Trump's emergence, the first debate promises to be an unruly affair.

Never have more than 10 candidates taken the stage for a televised Republican presidential debate. Part of the problem is basic math.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a 90-minute debate featuring so many candidates, there could be only enough time for four or five questions — with little time left over for the interaction between candidates that makes for an actual debate.

And few campaigns expect Trump to respect the time limits or other rules established by organizers.

While there were some rumblings about trying to bar Trump from the stage, some GOP leaders say they're happy about Trump's participation, predicting it will attract a far larger audience, exposing new people to Republican ideas.

"If I were Fox, I would be thrilled that Trump has made this so intense so early because they'll have a much higher viewership than they would have three or four weeks ago before Trump got on a roll," Gingrich said.

Ron Kaufman, a senior adviser to 2012 nominee Mitt Romney who is supporting Jeb Bush, said Trump offers a prime-time opportunity to lesser-known candidates to get attention.

"I think they have to pick a fight with Trump," Kaufman said.

Many candidates have already been hard at work. Bush, one of the top contenders, recently brought in two veterans of Romney's 2012 campaign, Beth Myers and Peter Flaherty, to help coach him. Aides say Bush will fill much of his schedule next week with debate preparation in Florida.

Bush has not participated in a debate as a candidate since his successful re-election campaign for governor in 2002.

"My objective with this is to, wherever I can, share my record," Bush said this week in South Carolina. He said he'll go into the debate without thinking about Trump or any rival but that it's his first presidential debate and he's "not certain how all this plays out."

Paul perhaps summed up the field's feeling best when asked how he prepares to face someone like Trump: "Very carefully," he said.

Trump Says He's 'Big Believer' in Merit-Based Immigration System // Bloomberg // Ben Brody - July 24, 2015

Donald Trump, the Republican presidential candidate who has taken a hard stance opposing illegal immigration, suggested he'd support leniency for some of the estimated 11 million people living in the U.S. without authorization.

"I'm a very big believer in merit system," Trump said on MSNBC's Morning Joe Friday. "Some of these people have been here, they've done a good job. You know, in some cases, sadly they've been living under the shadows."

The real estate mogul said securing the border and getting "the bad ones" out of the country permanently should be the priority, but that after that, deportation of all 11 million might not be his goal.

Donald Trump bans Des Moines Register from Iowa campaign event // Politico // Eliza Collins - July 24, 2015

Donald Trump courted further controversy on Friday by banning the Des Moines Register from attending his Iowa campaign event Saturday, according to the Register.

The real-estate mogul and Republican 2016 candidate was unhappy with an editorial published by the newspaper that called on Trump to pull out of the race.

“We’re not issuing credentials to anyone from The Des Moines Register based on the editorial that they wrote earlier in the week,” Trump’s campaign manager Corey Lewandowski told the newspaper.

He said he expected the campaign would reconsider for future events.

The editorial section of the Register — Iowa’s largest newspaper — operates independently from the newspaper’s political team.

“As we previously said, the editorial has no bearing on our news coverage. We work hard to provide Iowans with coverage of all the candidates when they spend time in Iowa, and this is obviously impeding our ability to do so. We hope Mr. Trump’s campaign will revisit its decision instead of making punitive decisions because we wrote something critical of him,” the Register’s editor Amalie Nash said in a statement.

Trump dominates GOP field in name ID // Politico // Nick Gass - July 24, 2015

Donald Trump is the best-known Republican candidate in the last two weeks, while former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is second, according to the results of a Gallup tracking poll of Republicans and Republican-leaners out Friday.

But neither is the best-liked over that same time frame.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson hold the best net favorable ratings in the presidential field of 16, at a net of 42 points and 40 points, respectively, while Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker is close behind at plus-34 points.

Among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents surveyed, 92 percent said they were familiar (i.e. had an opinion) with Trump, while 81 percent said they knew Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Several candidates, including Bush, were both well-known and well-liked among the Republicans surveyed. More than half of Republicans surveyed (54 percent) said they had a favorable opinion of the former governor of Florida, while 27 percent said they viewed him unfavorably, giving him a net favorability of +27 percentage points. Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee drew a net favorable rating of plus-37 percentage points, while 73 percent were familiar with him, followed by Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul with a familiarity rating of 68 percent and net favorability of plus-26 points. Approximately two-in-three voters said they had an opinion of Texas Gov. Rick Perry (67 percent), drawing a positive net favorable rating of 35 points.

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz drew a 66 percent familiarity rating, while grabbing a net favorable rating of plus-34 points. Next up, 64 percent of those surveyed said they knew of Rubio, who earned the best net favorability of any Republican hopeful.

Other candidates, like Walker, Carson and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, are well-liked but are not as well-known.

Approximately half of those surveyed had an opinion on each of the three candidates, though all three polled quite favorably with the base (Walker at plus-34, Carson at plus-40 and Jindal and plus-29).

Just two candidates — Trump and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie — are well-known but are comparatively not as well-liked, according to Gallup. With 92 percent familiar with him, Trump's net favorability is still in the black at plus-20 points, though far behind other top contenders. With 72 percent familiar with Christie, the governor's net favorability is a comparatively smaller plus-6 points.

The only Republican candidate with negative favorability in the poll is former New York Gov. George Pataki, at negative-7 points, though just 49 percent of those surveyed said they were familiar with him. Voters were only less familiar with former Hewlett Packard executive Carly Fiorina (39 percent) and Ohio Gov. John Kasich (35 percent). Both Fiorina and Kasich drew net favorable ratings of plus-23 points and plus-15 points, respectively.

Results for the poll came from landline and cellphone interviews conducted July 8-21 as part of the Gallup U.S. Daily survey. These results were based on a sample of 1,028 Republicans and GOP leaners nationwide, carrying a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Donald Trump county chair not 'a 100 percent fan' of Donald Trump // Politico // Cate Martel - July 24, 2015

Add this to the list of the latest Donald Trump drama: At least one of his 17 New Hampshire county chairs said he doesn't actually support the real estate mogul.

Or does he?

Raul Cervantes, who serves as Trump's Grafton County chairman, told POLITICO last week that he's not fully supportive of Trump — especially in light of the candidate's recent remarks about immigration.

But just hours after he told POLITICO about his issues with Trump, the campaign forwarded a message from Cervantes effectively backtracking on his comments. Cervantes would not explain what changed his mind, and the Trump campaign would not elaborate.

"I think his written statement that says he supports Trump speaks for itself," Trump's campaign manager Corey Lewandowski told POLITICO Friday. When asked what prompted Cervantes's email, Lewandowski could not explain. "I have no idea. I'm sitting in New York today, so I don't know of every conversation that takes place in each of the states on a daily basis."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The controversy began last Tuesday when Cervantes told POLITICO, “Yes, I’m a county chair for Donald Trump because I did a favor to my friend. That doesn’t mean I’m a 100 percent fan of his.”

Cervantes, a Mexican immigrant who lives in Lebanon, New Hampshire, said he was approached to join as a county chair by his friend Andrew Georgevits, Trump’s deputy state director, who didn’t respond for a request to comment. While he generally agrees with Trump, Cervantes thinks Trump needs to be more respectful to Latinos like him.

“You don’t have to generalize everybody. I come from Mexico and I’m not saying ‘all the Americans are fat people,’ said Cervantes. “Mexico, right now, is dealing with a drug-dealing problem, but a lot of Americans consume the drugs.”

Cervantes also expressed his support for Ohio Gov. John Kasich.

But later that evening, the Trump campaign forwarded POLITICO an all-caps email from Cervantes that said, “I, RAUL CERVANTES, DO SUPPORT MR DONALD TRUMP FOR PRESIDENT. RAUL CERVANTES.” The email was dated eight hours after he told POLITICO about his hesitance with the Trump campaign.

When POLITICO contacted Cervantes last Thursday to ask why he had a change of heart, Cervantes indicated that Georgevits had contacted him in the meantime and questioned his loyalty. “I support all the candidates in the Republican Party, OK?” Cervantes said.

“Nothing changed,” he added. “I [told] you I was a little in disagreement in what Mr. Donald expressed against the Mexicans, but you know, I can be in disagreement with Trump — [like I can] with members of my family — but that doesn’t mean I’m gonna dump him, right?”

Raul’s wife, Karen Cervantes, a local GOP official, has even more concerns about Trump. While she respects his business acumen, after attending a few events, she said she found him “arrogant” and sensed that Trump feels like he is “much better than us.”

“[A]s a president, he would scare the ever living out of me,” she said. “I just don’t think he knows how to work with people. He is used to being in a [position of power] and he is used to getting his way — and saying whatever he wants.”

Donald Trump: 'Maybe people will get tired of me' // Politico // Nick Gass - July 24, 2015

What could keep Donald Trump from getting the Republican nomination? Maybe people could get tired of him, the leading presidential candidate said Friday.

“I don’t know,” Trump said during a telephone interview with MSNBC’s “Morning Joe.” “I’m just chugging along. You know, maybe people will get tired of me. Who knows? This press is crazy.”

Responding to another question about a report from The Hill that he could seek an independent bid if the Republican National Committee treats him poorly during the primary season, Trump said the RNC is currently treating him “with tremendous respect.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The best way to win is to win as a Republican. I do not want to do independent at all. If I’m treated poorly, that’s one thing,” Trump said.

And if he doesn’t win, Trump said, it would be very hard to support pretty much any of the other Republican candidates.

“I may just sort of, like, shift off into the moonlight,” he said. “I hope that won’t be the case. I hope that won’t be the case, but it could very well be.”

Trump won’t be a long-term problem for the Republican Party, fellow GOP presidential candidate Marco Rubio said in a separate interview.

“Donald Trump’s not going to be the nominee,” Rubio told “CBS This Morning.” “These happen in these presidential races. These polls swing up and down.”

Trump also appears to want more attention from “Morning Joe.” He took issue with an earlier segment in which panelists discussed whether Ohio Gov. John Kasich has the “Jon Huntsman problem.” In that segment, host Mika Brzezinski pointed out, Scarborough talked about other candidates in that context but did not mention that Trump was at the top of national polls.

“Donald, you aren’t really that thin-skinned, are you?” Scarborough asked.

“Yes, oh, I’m thin-skinned,” Trump responded. “Oh, yes he is,” Brzezinski said, noting that her co-host and Trump are alike in that respect.

Later in the interview, Scarborough noted that many Americans support him on the border issue.

“And other things, Joe,” Trump responded.

“I know, Donald. My God! Stop being so thin-skinned” Scarborough replied.

Insiders: Donald Trump has peaked // Politico // Katie Glueck - July 24, 2015

About three quarters of Republican early-state insiders say they believe Donald Trump has peaked — but many acknowledge that may also be wishful thinking.

That’s the assessment from this week’s POLITICO Caucus, our weekly bipartisan survey of the top operatives, strategists and activists in Iowa and New Hampshire.

The controversial real estate mogul and GOP presidential candidate provoked some caucus insiders into offering expletives and other colorful language when asked whether Trump has hit his ceiling.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The McCain smear and giving out Graham’s cellphone? What an asshole,” vented a New Hampshire Republican, who says Trump has peaked. “Trumpism does not represent some deeper sentiment within the party, nor has he tapped into something a more conventional candidate can now co-opt. His candidacy has as much substance and meaning as cotton candy. I didn’t like him before. Now I loathe him.”

An Iowa Republican said, “yes,” when asked whether Trump has hit his zenith, but clarified, “I’d like to think so. But who the hell really knows anymore?”

The insiders weighed in following another week in which Trump dominated political coverage.

First, on Saturday, he dismissed Sen. John McCain’s heroism during his time as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, causing the other candidates to scramble to denounce him. Then on Tuesday, he gave out Sen. Lindsey Graham’s personal cellphone number; and finally on Thursday, he descended — with classic Trump bravado — on the U.S.-Mexico border after repeatedly inveighing against illegal immigrants with particularly heated rhetoric.

He was greeted in Laredo by several people who gave him the middle finger.

“I hope and pray that he has peaked,” added another Granite State Republican, who like all participants was granted anonymity in order to speak freely. “The GOP has a chance in 2016 and it diminishes each time Trump increases his poll numbers.”

Trump has caused heartburn for the Republican Party since he announced his White House run on June 16. Some of the first words out of his mouth involved calling undocumented Mexican immigrants “rapists,” to the horror of many establishment Republicans who want to see the party take a more inclusive approach after an abysmal performance with Hispanic voters in 2012.

Since then, it’s just gotten worse for Trump’s competitors as he’s sucked up the media oxygen and soared to the top of some national polls. Several Caucus insiders predicted that Trump would flame out soon, but others said he won’t lose steam before the first GOP primary debate next month, and may have legs into the fall, though few expect that his momentum will continue as the GOP field narrows.

“Everybody is still watching to see what he will do next,” a Granite State Republican said. “It’s like riding down the highway and seeing an accident in the other direction — you know [you] shouldn’t look but you do. I think by September he will begin a downward descent as people get totally sick of his antics.”

In this week’s survey, Granite Staters were slightly less likely than Iowans to say that Trump has hit his ceiling. Among New Hampshire Republicans, 73 percent say he has, while 81 percent of Hawkeye State Republicans said the same. The numbers overall were about reversed among Democrats, who are enjoying watching Republicans grapple with Trump — 74 percent of them said he isn’t done yet.

“GOP establishment (especially in early states) and some media are in a panic right now about Trump, and are quick to develop a storyline that he can’t last,” said a New Hampshire Democrat, who like all participants answered through an online submission form. “The truth is otherwise. The base loves him, he keeps showing top tier status nationally and in early states, he (like Hillary) has 100 percent name ID, and unlike all others, doesn’t need either traditional donors or dark money ones. While there are some parallels to [Ross] Perot, this is a new phenomenon and existing precedent doesn’t apply. Who knows where this goes?”

Another added, “If peaking is poll numbers, maybe, but this guy is far from done. He has no reason to drop out. He is going to be the focus of the first debate.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here are three other takeaways from this week's POLITICO Caucus:

Thanks in part to Donald Trump, not qualifying for the first debate is not necessarily fatal …

Eighty percent of New Hampshire Republicans, and 76 percent of Iowa Republicans, say candidates who don't poll high enough to qualify for the first presidential primary debate on Aug. 6 are not doomed — especially because, several predicted, Trump will steal the spotlight anyway.

"The more the first debate is dominated by Trump, the less damaging non-inclusion will be," said one Iowa Republican.

"Just wait: Pundits will talk about how 'refreshing' and 'interesting' it was to have a Trump-less debate where real issues were discussed and we could get to know a candidate more, beyond just how they answered or responded to Mr. Trump," added another.

"The audience will be watching for the Donald show and the [others] on the stage will be marginalized. They will seem like props. To quote a great Republican President: 'The world will little note nor long remember what they say here,'" said a New Hampshire Republican, cribbing from Abraham Lincoln.

Others said that controversy over debate rules — which the Republican National Committee, after moving to shorten the debate schedule, largely ceded to television stations — blurs the importance of the first debate.

Fox News has limited inclusion in that first debate to candidates who finish in the Top 10 in an average of national polls. The rest will get to participate in a one-hour event before the main show.

"We're still so far away from the actual voting day, and the debate over debates have become such a cluster that no regular voter is going to rule a candidate out for not making the cut," said a New Hampshire Republican.

… But missing out will take a toll.

Still, noted many insiders on both sides of the aisle, not qualifying is certainly not helpful. Democrats were more inclined to think getting onstage is important, with about a third of insiders saying not qualifying would kill a campaign, whereas only 22 percent of Republicans overall said the same.

"Not fatal, but anyone who misses it will be on life support," a New Hampshire Democrat said. "Voters need to limit their choices and appearing in the debate could be a big part of that process. The question is, what will the candidates do around the debate to be relevant if they aren't onstage?"

Overall, Republicans said the candidate who has the most to lose from not being on the stage is New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, followed by former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina. Christie and Perry are both right on the bubble, but Fiorina, who has made a big push to get onstage, lags further in polls.

"Christie's the guy who thinks of himself as the cleanup hitter. He is striking out in the polls, his fav/unfav has tanked all over the country, but if he can get that one perfect pitch, he'll try and drive it over the fence," an Iowa

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican said. “I don’t think he can salvage a lagging campaign with one debate performance, but there is precedent for it,” the source said, noting Newt Gingrich’s surge in South Carolina in 2012, driven in part by a debate tussle with moderator John King of CNN.

The numbers changed slightly when broken down by state: Christie got the most votes among Iowa Republicans with 30 percent, but a third of New Hampshire Republicans said it was most important for Fiorina to get onstage.

Twenty six percent of Democrats agreed that Christie most needed to be onstage — the same percentage that said John Kasich, the Ohio governor who announced for president this week, will also be damaged if he doesn’t make the cut because the debate is in his home state.

“Both Kasich and Bush are fighting over the ‘reform-minded governor’ niche,” said one Granite State Republican. “Moreover, Kasich has an ability to eat away at Bush’s advantage among independents who would vote in … New Hampshire’s open Republican primary.”

“He’s Jeb Bush by a different last name,” added an Iowa Republican. “And that is important to people who are worried about nominating another Bush.”

In New Hampshire, where both Kasich and Christie are also seeking to court the center-right vote, several caucus participants noted that the Garden State governor was also vulnerable to losing some support to the Ohio executive.

“He moves exactly into their air space,” said a New Hampshire Republican who thinks Kasich could pull from both Bush and Christie, if he can keep his notoriously short temper in check. “He does town halls as well as Christie and has a record of getting things done that exceeds Bush. I guarantee that every voter who is considering Bush/ Christie will now also look at Kasich.”

“Blunt-talking governors who have a successful record full of left leaning policy baggage draw from the same side of the pond,” argued another.

But some caucus participants — particularly those in Iowa — were skeptical that Kasich would gain enough traction to pull votes from anyone.

“Nobody is talking about Kasich,” said one Hawkeye State Republican.

Dennis Rodman endorses Donald Trump for president // Politico // Adam B. Lerner - July 24, 2015

Dennis Rodman has endorsed Donald Trump for president.

On Friday, the five-time NBA champion tweeted that the Donald “has been a great friend for many years.”

“We don’t need another politician, we need a businessman like Mr. Trump! Trump 2016,” he added.

Trump responded on Twitter, writing, “Thank you @DennisRodman. It’s time to #MakeAmericaGreatAgain! I hope you are doing well!”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rodman previously appeared on Donald Trump's NBC television show "The Celebrity Apprentice" and was the fifth contestant fired, of 16 total contestants.

He announced his support of Trump only an hour after defending World Wrestling Entertainment legend Hulk Hogan in separate tweets. Hogan was released from the WWE after audio of him using racial slurs reportedly surfaced.

"I've known @HulkHogan for 25 years," Rodman, who has previously appeared in the WWE, tweeted. "There isn't a racist bone in that mans [sic] body."

The former NBA All-Star has previously drawn controversy for traveling to North Korea and playing in a basketball game for the country's dictator, Kim Jong-un.

Rodman defended the trip by calling the North Korean leader a "friend."

After the North Korea visit, Trump praised Rodman for going to the Pyongyang and agreed with the basketball player that President Obama should call Kim Jong-un.

Later, Trump tweeted that Rodman "is saying I wanted to go to North Korea with him."

"Never discussed, no interest, last place on Earth I want to go," Trump added.

He also wrote, "Dennis Rodman was either drunk or on drugs (delusional) when he said I wanted to go to North Korea with him. Glad I fired him on Apprentice!"

The State That Facebooks About Donald Trump the Most // Bloomberg // A.J. Feather - July 24, 2015

Guess which state is Facebooking the most about Donald Trump?

Not New York, where the real estate mogul grew up and maintains his corporate headquarters.

Not Florida, where Trump's swanky Palm Beach property is the venue for many of his over-the-top celebrations.

No, the state where Trump's presidential campaign is generating the most chatter on Facebook is... West Virginia. Connecticut, The District of Columbia, Alabama, and, finally, New York, round out the top five.

That's just one of the unexpected facts unearthed by Facebook in data released Thursday.

In terms of overall numbers, Democrat Hillary Clinton is dominates the social network. Whether measuring by interactions within the first 24 hours of her campaign launch or the last 90 days, no one comes close to the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination. Within 24 hours of making her candidacy of her candidacy, Clinton generated 10.1 million interactions on Facebook from 4.7 million people, according to data compiled by the social networking site.

Donald Trump came closest to the former secretary of state in interactions within the first 24 hours after launching his presidential campaign. But the 6.4 million interactions from 3.4 million people generated by the real estate mogul's announcement amounted to less than three-fourths of the Clinton's figure. Trump falls far behind Clinton when comparing the average number of unique people discussing each candidate over the last 90 days, but that may be due to his campaign being just more than a month old. Clinton made her bid for the presidency official on April 13.

Although his announcement day generated a less-than stellar amount of interaction, Jeb Bush has maintained a strong, steady following over the last three months. Bush ranks second to Clinton when comparing the average number of unique people discussing each candidate over the last 90 days. However, Clinton remains far away in the lead with 270,000 unique people per day. That gives her more than three times Bush's figure of 85,000.

Also intriguing: the location of interactions. While much of the country may be trying to avoid the early onset of presidential politics, Washington, D.C. ranks in the top five states chattering about each and every candidate. For all but three contenders, the top site for Facebook traffic is their home state.

Trump Says He's 'Big Believer' in Merit-Based Immigration System // Bloomberg // Ben Brody - July 24, 2015

Donald Trump, the Republican presidential candidate who has taken a hard stance opposing illegal immigration, suggested he'd support leniency for some of the estimated 11 million people living in the U.S. without authorization.

"I'm a very big believer in merit system," Trump said on MSNBC's Morning Joe Friday. "Some of these people have been here, they've done a good job. You know, in some cases, sadly they've been living under the shadows."

The real estate mogul said securing the border and getting "the bad ones" out of the country permanently should be the priority, but that after that, deportation of all 11 million might not be his goal.

"If somebody's been outstanding, we try and work something out," he said.

He did not say whether he would support a path to citizenship, which many Republicans oppose as “amnesty.”

GOP's nightmare: An Independent Donald Trump // CNN // MJ Lee - July 24, 2015

Republicans dreaming of shooing away Donald Trump may want to think twice.

By publicly rebuking the billionaire businessman for his inflammatory comments, the party may convince Trump to launch a third-party candidacy.

That's a potential nightmare scenario for the GOP establishment: a populist outsider with unlimited resources attacking their nominee from the right in the general election, raising hell -- and attracting votes -- with his rhetoric on issues like illegal immigration.

Ralph Nader, who has run for president multiple times as a third-party candidate and may have cost Democrat Al Gore the 2000 election by running to his left, said Republicans mishandle Trump at their own peril.

"The Republican Party establishment is playing with nitroglycerine when it goes after Donald Trump and tries to minimize him and exclude him," Nader said in an interview Thursday. "Because a jilted Donald Trump as a third-party candidate can blow the presidential race wide open and turn it into a three way race."

Trump has become a favorite punching bag since launching his White House campaign last month, angering fellow Republicans by questioning Sen. John McCain's status as a war hero last week.

Trump has fired back at the criticism -- especially a rebuke from the typically-neutral Republican National Committee. He's repeatedly declined to rule out a third-party White House run, saying in an interview with CNN's Anderson Cooper earlier this month that he's constantly being asked to run as an independent. This week, he told The Hill that his decision will depend on "how I'm being treated by the Republicans."

No small feat

Launching a third-party candidacy is no small feat. It is a time-consuming and expensive process riddled with logistical hurdles, including massive signature-gathering requirements to gain ballot access in each of the 50 states.

But if it's tedious, it's hardly impossible — particularly for a candidate with money to throw around.

Republicans remember all too well businessman Ross Perot's independent candidacy for president in 1992. The Texan made an appeal to voters looking for an alternative to establishment candidates, and his campaign is widely considered to have complicated George H.W. Bush's effort to win reelection against Bill Clinton.

Clay Mulford, Perot's son-in-law and political adviser, said a third-party run from Trump has the potential to energize a part of the electorate that's itching for a fresh face.

"There is just a sense of ineffectiveness of the two-party system. So I think he would do better than expected if he were in the debates and if he were considered viable," Mulford said. "And having money helps."

Indeed, poll numbers suggest that a third-party candidacy from Trump would damage Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a top-tier candidate in the current Republican field.

Bush

Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton leads Bush, 50% to 44%, in a head-to-head match-up, according to an ABC News/Washington Post poll out this week. But throw an independent Trump into that race, and Clinton's lead grows significantly to 46%, leaving Bush at 30%.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He'd be the one person that would probably fit the bill. He's not really a Republican, he's not a Democrat," said former U.S. Sen. Dean Barkley of Minnesota, who was appointed and served briefly as an independent by Gov. Jesse Ventura.

Independents "decide the election every four years and if all of them or most of them go to Trump, that leaves the Republicans too small of a base to have any chance of winning."

At a campaign stop in New Hampshire Thursday, Bush made sure to emphasize that he isn't dismissive of Trump's candidacy.

"I think he's a serious candidate and he's going to have a lot of money. He's tapping into people's angst that are legitimate," Bush said.

Meanwhile, during a visit to the U.S.-Mexico border in Laredo, Texas, Thursday, Trump said his preference is to run as a Republican and he was confident that he could win the party's nomination.

But in many ways, a third-party run makes a lot of sense for Trump.

The former host of the reality TV show "The Apprentice" was once a registered a Democrat, donated money to members of both parties, and considered running for president in 2000 as an independent.

At the very core of his campaign is the idea that he is the anti-politician. Trump has never held public office and he loves to point out that thanks to his massive wealth — which he claims amounts to more than $10 billion — he is not beholden to anyone, including party leadership.

Headaches for the GOP

This last point has already created massive headaches for the GOP.

Trump sparked furious backlash by referring to some Mexican immigrants that enter the United States as "criminals" and "rapists." Republicans criticized Trump's choice of words as being hurtful and insensitive to the immigrant community, but many chose their words carefully — a sign of how delicate of an issue illegal immigration is.

For many Republicans, Trump seemed to cross the line last weekend with his critique of McCain.

"I like people that weren't captured, OK?" Trump said of the Arizona Republican senator, who spent more than five years in as a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War.

The RNC, which remains neutral in the GOP nominating process, took the unusual move of speaking out.

"There is no place in our party or our country for comments that disparage those who have served honorably," said RNC spokesman Sean Spicer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The RNC declined to comment for this story.

Bill Hillsman, a political consultant who has worked for a number of independent candidates including in gubernatorial races in Massachusetts and Texas, said the party's condemnation of Trump is likely to have helped fuel Trump's unorthodox campaign.

"I think the damage is already done to a large extent," Hillsman said. "All the people who said well, his campaign is over now and blasted him for some of his previous comments, many of which he's walked back, they already have just pretty much dismissed this guy and the polls are saying otherwise."

Rep. Joaquín Castro blasts Laredo's 'bizarre' welcome for Trump // MSNBC // John O'Brien - July 24, 2015

Congressman Joaquín Castro is speaking out against fellow Texas leaders for embracing Donald Trump's Thursday visit to the U.S.-Mexico border in Laredo, Texas.

In a tweet to Laredo Mayor Pete Saenz, Castro wrote that Trump exploited the city's government for his own image, and added that the city's reception of Trump was "embarrassing for South Texans and Hispanics."

Castro doubled down on his criticism on msnbc Friday. "They rolled out the red carpet for Donald Trump, someone who's made just hateful comments about Mexican immigrants," Castro said on Andrea Mitchell Reports. "To treat him like an officeholder or like he's President of the United States or even the nominee already, I thought it was just bizarre, considering what he said."

In Trump's presidential campaign launch speech in June, the real estate mogul and reality television star said, "When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending the best. They're not sending you, they're sending people that have lots of problems and they're bringing those problems."

On Friday on Morning Joe, Trump addressed the controversy around his own remarks about immigration and touched on the possibility of a system that would allow undocumented immigrants to stay in the U.S. based on their contributions.

Castro said Trump's recognition that deportation for millions of undocumented people was not a solution. "I'm glad that he seems to be a little more reasonable than he was before," he said, "but still: all of his comments have just made a serious conversation on immigration and dealing with it in Congress much tougher now."

How Donald Trump Could Fall Into the Ross Perot Trap // Daily Beast // Eleanor Clift - July 24, 2015

In 1992, the Texas billionaire thrived on all the free media coverage. But then he refused to spend money. If Trump is serious about a third-party run, he'll need to shell out.

There was no social media in April 1992 when Texas billionaire Ross Perot announced his third-party candidacy on the Larry King show.

But Perot had 4 million volunteers who called his 800-number, and when Republican strategist Ed Rollins asked what he did with their information, Perot said he had it all on computer cards. Great, Rollins thought. A veteran of many campaigns, including President Reagan's, he had been brought in to professionalize Perot's grassroots campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Four million names was like money in the bank in those days, but Perot bristled at the idea of sending “junk mail” to his prized volunteers. “He had no understanding of the game, and when he saw it, he didn’t like it,” Rollins recalled in a phone interview with The Daily Beast. As Perot gained strength in the polls, the media scrutiny intensified, and he told Rollins, “I never got bad press until I hired you and Hamilton [Jordan].”

Rollins told him that he was being treated like any other candidate, and in June 1992, with Perot polling at 39 percent, ahead of both President George H.W. Bush and Democrat Bill Clinton, Jordan, who had been President Carter’s chief of staff, exclaimed, “If we’re not careful, we’ll elect this guy.” Rollins assured him not to worry. He had by then figured out Perot was not going to listen to any of their advice and was temperamentally unsuited to run a campaign, much less the country.

Still, he got 19 percent of the vote in the November election, which was almost 20 million votes, and many analysts believe he handed the election to Clinton. Thirty-two years later, another rich Republican is off the reservation and threatening to run as a third-party candidate. And another Clinton could benefit. “As an Independent, [Donald Trump] would take a certain segment, mostly Republicans, which tilts the race to Hillary,” says Rollins.

“Perot didn’t understand advertising and PR. He didn’t understand the presidency, and he had very little substance.”

There are similarities between the two men in wealth and ego, and in the tightfistedness of the very rich when it comes to parting with their own money. Rollins had proposed to Perot a $150 million media campaign with Hal Riney, creator of Reagan’s “Morning in America” ads, at the helm. Perot balked. He wasn’t going to spend money on all those longhaired hippies behind the cameras when he could go on Larry King for nothing.

Perot was very tight with the dollar, and a third-party bid is expensive. He wasn’t willing to spend the money. Trump is much more savvy than Perot ever was. “Trump is very reluctant to spend his money, but he’s been through the wars, he’s used to being battered around,” says Rollins. “Perot didn’t understand advertising and PR. He didn’t understand the presidency, and he had very little substance.”

Trump knows the game. The big question for him is how far he will take his candidacy in terms of dollars he will put on the line. “No one knows how much Trump is willing to spend,” says Rollins. “I think at this point he’s a distraction. The potential is there for him to be a very destructive force in the party. The country is pretty disgusted with politicians, and that’s what he’s tapping into.”

Trump has so far offered very little substance on issues other than to claim he would get a better deal with China and he would get Mexico to pay for a border wall. Perot raised one important issue, the deficit, and he became a Johnny One Note on the subject. John White, a former Carter OMB and Defense Department official who was brought in to teach Perot the issues, was alarmed at how little the candidate knew and how uninterested he was in learning. Give me a one-pager on health care, he would bark, and that was it.

Like Perot, Trump appears to have a very shallow understanding of what the presidency is all about, and he’s not temperamentally qualified to be president.

But two billionaires three decades apart reflect and are captive to an angry electorate. Perot said some stupid things, more out of lack of knowledge, says Rollins. Trump is mean-spirited, and if he doesn’t feel he’s being treated fairly by the GOP, he has the club of running third party. Ballot access in all 50 states is not hard, but it’s expensive. You have to hire people and they have to collect enough signatures to qualify. Americans Elect did it in 2012 on a “build it and they will come theory,” but no candidate stepped up to run.

Trump is already altering the dynamics of the race. “It’s his plane, it’s his staff; he has all kinds of resources available to him. And there’s a novelty to him,” says Rollins. That novelty might wear off as it did with Perot, whose bizarre behavior became more obvious closer to the election. Whether or not Trump is in it for the duration, he's created bigger problems for his party with Hispanics. "On immigration, he's stirring up the hard core right wing of our base, so if someone like Jeb Bush says something different, he could get booed off the stage," says Rollins.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican pollster Frank Luntz worked with the Perot campaign, and said in an email that Trump has "all the advantages Perot had…and one more that Perot didn't. He has the thickest skin of anyone I've ever seen in politics. Nothing bothers him, and you need that fortitude to be a successful third-party candidate."

For those trying to gauge the seriousness of Trump's campaign, the reported involvement of pollster Pat Caddell adds to concerns that Trump could be hell bent on destroying the GOP in order to save it. Caddell was the architect of what became known as Carter's "malaise" speech, and the two seem like a match made in heaven. New York magazine reports that he and Trump talk almost every night. Caddell has searched for years to find a candidate who doesn't distort his message.

"All I can say is Trump makes Ross Perot look like George Washington," says Gerald Rafshoon, Carter's former media adviser, who flew to Dallas in '92 to meet with Perot about his ad campaign. The meeting didn't go well. Perot told Rafshoon he could get on TV any time he wanted, so why should he spend money on ads? To underscore his point, he called out to his secretary to get Larry King on the phone and book him for that evening.

Perot's candidacy was born on King's CNN show and for a time thrived in that venue. Trump is a cable news creature, plus he's known from his show, The Apprentice, and his signature line, "You're fired." How long he can keep his candidacy going depends on how long the free media continues, and how much of his own money he is willing to spend.

If Trump runs as a third-party candidate, he will have to spend money, a lot of it, and if he concludes his chances in the end are no better than Perot's of cracking the two-party lock, that may not look like a deal he'll want to make.

Stay Classy: Trump Used To Test His Dates For AIDS // Daily Beast // Asawin Suebsaeng - July 24, 2015

In the early '90s, the Donald said he would ask his ladies to swing by the doctor for an AIDS test before he'd wine and dine them.

Future American President Donald J. Trump appears to be a tad germophobic.

"One of the curses of American society is the simple act of shaking hands, and the more successful and famous one becomes the worse this terrible custom seems to get," the 2016 Republican presidential frontrunner wrote in his book The Art of the Comeback, published in 1997. "I happen to be a clean hands freak. I feel much better after I thoroughly wash my hands, which I do as much as possible." (He has repeatedly described the custom of handshaking as "barbaric," because of the germs.)

But his fear of disease goes well beyond his worries about catching a cold from glad handers. According to an early '90s Associated Press article, Trump—then a "newly eligible bachelor"—talked about how he asked women to agree to an AIDS test at his doctor's office before he would take them out on a date.

"It's one of the worst times in the history of the world to be dating," he explained in late June 1991, roughly four months before Magic Johnson announced that he tested HIV-positive, and before Queen frontman Freddie Mercury died of AIDS.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump made his comments shortly after his divorce from Ivana Trump was finalized, and after he had been seen out on the town with TV personality Marla Maples and then model Carla Bruni.

"I have been known to say that to women," the real estate mogul and notorious womanizer told Newsday when asked if he actually asked potential lovers to test for STDs. "It's one way to be careful. There are a lot of ways. I'm saying, take all of those ways and double them, because you will need them...It's very scary out there."

In the early '90s, the Donald said he would ask his ladies to swing by the doctor for an AIDS test before he'd wine and dine them.

After some years of wooing and HIV-testing, Trump would settle down and remarry, twice. But along the way there was one famous woman he regretted never asking out: Princess Diana.

"Do you think you would have seriously had a shot?" NBC's Stone Phillips asked Trump during a Dateline segment from November 1997. (Princess Diana had died that past August.) "I think so, yeah," Trump replied. "I always have a shot."

Trump claimed he never asked her out because he was always too busy. It is unclear if The Donald would have AIDS-tested the late Princess of Wales, had he not been so busy.

Trump barring Des Moines Register from campaign event // Des Moines Register // Jason Noble - July 24, 2015

Donald Trump's presidential campaign has denied The Des Moines Register press credentials to gain access to a candidate event scheduled for Saturday in Oskaloosa.

The reason: an editorial published by the newspaper last Tuesday calling on Trump to quit the Republican race.

Register political columnist Kathie Obradovich was informed Friday that she had been denied a credential to the event, a "family picnic" featuring Trump that will be held at 11 a.m. on Saturday at the George Daily Community Auditorium in Oskaloosa.

Trump's national campaign manager, Corey Lewandowski, told Obradovich in a phone call that the Register was being excluded from the event because of the editorial.

The Register's editorial board operates independently from the editors and reporters who conduct political coverage.

In a subsequent conversation with the Register's chief political reporter, Jennifer Jacobs, Lewandowski reiterated that news staffers were being denied access because of the editorial.

"We're not issuing credentials to anyone from The Des Moines Register based on the editorial that they wrote earlier in the week," he said.

Lewandowski said he expected the campaign would consider allowing the Register to attend events at some point in the future.

Trump responded to the editorial's publication almost immediately on Wednesday, denouncing the Register's coverage as "uneven," "inconsistent" and "dishonest." Still, it is highly unusual for a political campaign to deny credentials to a media organization.

Much about Trump's candidacy has been unusual, though, even as it has succeeded in drawing massive national media exposure and vaulted him to the top of many national polls on the Republican race.

In a statement, Amalie Nash, the Register's editor and vice president for audience engagement, emphasized the division between the newspaper's news and opinion desks.

"We are disappointed that Mr. Trump's campaign has taken the unusual step of excluding Register reporters from covering his campaign event in Iowa on Saturday because he was displeased with our editorial," she said. "As we previously said, the editorial has no bearing on our news coverage. We work hard to provide Iowans with coverage of all the candidates when they spend time in Iowa, and this is obviously impeding our ability to do so. We hope Mr. Trump's campaign will revisit its decision instead of making punitive decisions because we wrote something critical of him."

Priebus: Trump won't run as third-party candidate // The Hill // Kevin Cirilli - July 24, 2015

Republican National Committee (RNC) chairman Reince Priebus on Friday said he does not think Donald Trump will run as a third-party candidate should the billionaire business mogul lose the GOP nomination.

"I don't think he's going to do that. I think he knows that if you're going to beat Hillary Clinton — if Hillary Clinton is going to get beat, there's only one party that's going to beat her: It's the Republican Party," Priebus said on Fox News' "On The Record: With Greta Van Susteren."

Earlier Friday, Trump — who has surged to the top of the early Republican presidential polls — seemed to soften his tone against the RNC after telling The Hill on Wednesday that he would consider a third-party run if RNC leaders were unfair to him during the primary process.

"I want to run as a Republican. I think I'll get the nomination," Trump said on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" earlier Friday.

Priebus said on Fox News that "any one of the sixteen candidates on our side know that the only individual that is going to beat Hillary Clinton is going to be a Republican if she's going to get beat, if she's going to be beat. Period. And everyone in America knows that's true."

Earlier this month, Priebus reportedly called Trump and asked him to tone down his rhetoric on immigration. RNC officials also released a public statement denouncing Trump's comments about Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) on Saturday.

Trump had said that he didn't think McCain was a war hero, but he immediately followed up by saying that he did think McCain was a war hero.

Trump has received an onslaught of criticism from the crowded Republican presidential field, including former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

Host Greta Van Susteren described Priebus' job as a bit like "herding cats right now."

"It's a little bit like that, but then when you look at the polling and you see that Hillary Clinton is losing to candidates in key battleground states with her 100 percent name ID, I kind of like where we're sitting," Priebus answered.

He added that having so such a big field was ”a lot for our party to handle but it's also a great opportunity."

"I'm tired of the name-calling — from everybody — and I think it needs to stop from whatever source, from whatever place," Priebus said of GOP infighting.

KASICH

Stalking Jeb Bush in New Hampshire // Politico // Eli Stokols - July 24, 2015

As campaign staffers hurriedly darted about, carrying in more chairs to accommodate a larger-than-expected crowd, two older men sat and chatted as the room filled up, waiting for John Kasich to arrive for his town hall on Thursday afternoon. They spoke about the Ohio governor’s reputation as a budget hawk and even his record as a congressman with great detail.

“He did that balanced budget amendment back in 1997,” one of them said to the other.

“And he’s done it in Ohio twice,” the other responded.

As savvy and substantive as New Hampshire voters can be, they’re also just as susceptible to television ads as voters anywhere else. The biographical bullet points the two men were reciting have, in fact, been blanketing New Hampshire in recent weeks, part of an early $3 million TV ad buy — 4,000 gross rating points across multiple markets in three weeks — aimed at introducing the relatively unknown candidate to Granite Staters confronting a crowded field of GOP contenders, more than half of whom view this state as critical to their hopes of breaking through.

If he catches on here, Kasich poses the biggest direct threat to Jeb Bush, another establishment-friendly candidate with a centrist conservative message, in his most critical early voting state.

It’s a big if, but that battle began in earnest Thursday, as both candidates spent the day criss-crossing the hilly hamlets of New Hampshire’s north country.

Bush, who has led the GOP field here for almost two months,and Kasich, who still barely registers, are appealing to the same subset of Republican primary voters, those for whom promises of bipartisanship and various challenges to the hard-line GOP orthodoxies of the moment aren’t anathema — but they are, stylistically, at times a study in contrasts.

It starts, at least in Kasich’s rendition, with their biographies. While Bush typically brushes past his privileged upbringing to tell voters about his life-altering trip to Mexico where he met his wife at age 17, Kasich opens by mentioning that his father was a mail carrier. “I grew up in a blue-collar neighborhood outside Pittsburgh,” Kasich said Thursday as he introduced himself to a crowd of 100 people. “Blue collar, common sense, God-fearing and all that stuff.”

As meandering a speaker as he can be — when a questioner mentioned a Czech pilsner because Kasich’s ancestry is Czech, he told a long, rambling anecdote about being in Paris with his wife because, he explained, they’d been in Prague on the same vacation — he is concise and colloquial, summarizing his priorities into three simple bullet points: balancing budgets, strengthening the military and fostering more bipartisan comity in Washington.

Answering one question about campaign finance, Kasich offered his most obvious critique of Bush, whose $114 million six-month haul leaves him well positioned to bruise and outlast his many rivals over the course of a long, sprawling primary fight.

“I think there is an element of fundraising influencing some decisions; not my decisions — I could care less, but it’s an issue,” Kasich said. “Money can’t buy you love in New Hampshire.”

Bush, as evidenced by his hustle here, gets that. For now, he doesn’t seem to view Kasich as anything more than another trifling inconvenience on his path to the nomination. Yes, Kasich is folksy and blue-collar. Yes, he’s from critical Ohio. Yes, his message and tone are largely the same as Bush’s, appealing to the same voters.

And yet.

Bush, confident in his campaign’s overwhelming financial advantage, his spot on the debate stage given his consistently high standing in national polls and the durability of his mainstream message, is plodding along, content to let the national media chase Donald Trump while he works small towns where just a few hundred Republican votes are up for grabs.

As Trump neared the U.S.-Mexico border Thursday morning, Bush was almost to Canada. On the front porch of Lahout’s Country Store in Littleton, the country’s oldest ski shop, Bush continued to present himself as the anti-Trump, a candidate engaged in more than mere performance art, one meeting voters where they are, offering substance and a record of conservative executive leadership.

“I’m not a candidate who has a grievance; I’m not angry,” Bush said. “I’m the tortoise in the race: slow, steady progress.”

Bush suggested to reporters on Thursday that he, like most observers, thinks Trump-mentum will fade. When it does, he’ll still have to contend with Kasich, not to mention Marco Rubio, Chris Christie, Rick Perry, Carly Fiorina and Lindsey Graham, all making a play for New Hampshire and its more establishment-tilting primary electorate.

Currently, polls show Bush in good shape, atop the GOP field with around 15 percent support in New Hampshire, enough for a five-point cushion over his closest rivals (for the moment that’s Trump, followed by Scott Walker, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio). Kasich, tracking at just 2 percent in New Hampshire, has a long way to go — but longtime political observers here think he has the most room to grow.

“Kasich has the potential to capitalize on Bush fatigue,” said Fergus Cullen, a conservative columnist and New Hampshire primary historian. “I’ve seen them both and like them both. Part of Kasich’s pitch, subtle and unstated, is that if you like Bush’s record, message, tone and electability in a swing state, you get that with Kasich without any baggage.”

Bush’s jam-packed schedule on Thursday, which included stops at a candy store, a VFW hall in Lancaster and a town hall in Gorham, was an investment in the type of retail politics voters here demand, a charm offensive aimed at winning people over by making personal connections: photo-ops with preschoolers, accepting a jug of maple syrup from the Lahouts, signing Solo cups and endlessly posing for “selfies.”

As Bush plopped himself onto a lawn with a dozen three- and four-year-olds, a passel of photographers and iPhone-wielding reporters snapped away. Rich Killion, the New Hampshire operative overseeing Bush’s campaign here, hustled around, unable to hide the grin on his face.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“There’s an old saying: If you tell one person in North Country about an issue or a presidential candidate, everybody knows because everyone knows their neighbors, everyone’s related up here,” said Joe Kenny, a member of New Hampshire’s Executive Council from the North Country who was at events for Bush and Kasich Thursday. “The difference between the vote count in who’s going to be first, second or third is only a few thousand people. So, you come up to these small North Country towns [and] you can collect a lot of votes.”

Unlike Kasich or other long-shots, Bush is finding a number of Democratic activists showing up to his appearances. One young woman slapped a Jeb! sticker on her T-shirt and took her place inside the VFW hall, but Bush recognized her, and her questions about climate change, from past meetings. A tracker from American Bridge, the primary Democratic opposition research group, follows and records his every move.

The scrutiny – and missteps like his weeklong attempt in May to cleanly answer a question about Iraq to more recent statements about workers putting in “longer hours” and, on Wednesday night here, “phasing out” entitlement programs — may make Bush a more polished, message-disciplined candidate. But as much or more than any of his rivals, he is constantly answering questions, engaging with reporters, activists and voters of every stripe, flouting his capacity for ad-libbing beyond his talking points.

“I campaign like Jeb,” he said in South Carolina on Tuesday, even though only long-time Floridians could have any idea what he meant.

The accessibility, in many ways, has become elemental to Bush’s main message, a point of emphasis and contrast to rivals like Walker, who has yet to hold a town hall in New Hampshire, and Hillary Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee whose campaign corralled reporters a safe distance from the candidate with a rope during a July 4 parade through Gorham, where Bush held his town hall Thursday.

Although Bush joked about the rope line, his comments about his political approach have focused more of late on separating himself from his fellow Republicans, specifically Trump, who has basically hijacked the primary with his can’t-look-away antics.

“It’s a large number of people and I respect them all,” Bush said of the GOP field. “I’m running to win, I’m not running to make a point. I’m not running because my version of conservative reform philosophy is better than anybody else’s. I’m not running because I’m angry. I’m running because I want to win to fix these things and I think I have the leadership skills to do so.

“I’m running to draw people towards our cause, rather than push them away. A Republican will never be elected president of the United States unless we campaign like this, where we campaign in every nook and cranny of this country.”

Kasich’s message of inclusion – he speaks of job growth as a “the most important moral purpose of government” and of healing the partisan divide – isn’t much different from Bush’s. Just as Bush often affirms he is campaigning with “joy in my heart,” Kasich on Thursday evening told reporters he, too, is having a lot of fun, echoing Bush right down to the characteristic sarcasm they share.

“I’m enjoying this,” said Kasich, whose prickly reputation may well be an asset here in a state where voters are often drawn to candidates who are a little rougher around the edges. “I’m actually having fun.”

His top adviser, John Weaver, who oversaw John McCain’s successful New Hampshire campaigns in 2000 and 2008, touted the response Kasich is getting so far in terms of voters signing up to support him, including many who waited a lot longer to sign on with McCain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We are building as deep and wide an organization in New Hampshire as I have ever been a part of, including John's in 2000," Weaver said. "It's clear voters are finding something real and refreshing in John Kasich."

As amazing as it sounds in a field this large, there appears to be an opening for Kasich, especially with Christie struggling to catch on. Despite a campaign built around the New Hampshire-style politics of "telling it like it is," the New Jersey governor is stuck around five percent in the polls after an almost constant presence in the state for months. Similarly, long-shots like Graham and Fiorina, however endearing, are struggling to turn warm receptions from voters into hard support.

Kasich, Weaver points out, is largely undefined in New Hampshire; his negatives are low, especially compared to Christie's, and he may hold appeal to moderate conservatives concerned about the baggage of the Bush brand. What remains to be seen is whether he can seize that opportunity, whether he'll have the resources to continue running TV ads into the fall and winter, whether he can convince voters he can actually win the nomination.

"It's odd," Bush said Tuesday of Kasich's likely absence from the first primary debate taking place next week in Cleveland, which is closed to candidates polling outside the top 10 nationally.

"John Kasich is an effective governor and has a great record," Bush said, killing Kasich with kindness, assured of his own place on next week's debate stage.

"And I'll give a shoutout to Kasich if he's not on. Maybe he'll be in the crowd if he's not in there."

John Kasich Is the Real Deal: Pay Attention To Him // Forbes // John Zogby - July 24, 2015

Seemingly lost in the all the "Donaldfoolery" of late is that a real candidate announced his bid for the Republican nomination for President: Governor John Kasich of Ohio. Kasich brings a singular level of experience to the race as both a legislator and an executive, significant business success, four decades of winning elections, and impressive (even historic) accomplishments in public policy. He is what Governors Scott Walker and Chris Christie can, at this point in their tenures, only aspire to be. He has more experience than both former Governor Jeb Bush and Senator Marco Rubio combined. And he has the kind of blue collar support needed in a GOP must-win state.

Let's examine the real advantages he represents.

Resume

Kasich has been a state Senator, was elected to nine terms as a member of Congress, chairman of the House Budget Committee, and has twice elected Governor of Ohio. His grandparents were immigrants from Eastern Europe and he was born into a working class family in western Pennsylvania.

Policy success

Kasich was the chief architect and major negotiator of the 1997 balanced budget during the Clinton administration, an agreement that brought the first balanced federal budget since 1969 and led eventually to a federal budget surplus. Kasich also chaired the congressional conference committee that adopted major welfare reform, requiring new work/training requirements into the system. He also played a major part in House passage of the Goldwater–Nichols Act, the first real restructuring and streamlining of the military command structure since the creation of the Department of Defense in 1947. Under his tenure as Governor, Ohio's unemployment rate has been nearly halved from 9.4% to about 5%, the state's surplus has more than tripled, and he has cut taxes by $3 billion and consolidated and streamlined the state's economic development efforts

He's a winner

In addition to his state and Congressional district victories, he defeated an incumbent Democrat, Governor Ted Strickland in 2010, and then won re-election with 64% of the vote in 2014. He has received significantly more support from both Latino and African American voters than Republicans can usually expect.

Across the aisle

While this may not be popular with hardliners in the GOP, Kasich is a moderate conservative. He favors smaller government and tax reform, but he has worked successfully with Democrats to pass both important legislation and to be an early adopter of Medicaid expansion in Ohio under the provisions of the Affordable Care Act. At the same time, he has not shied away from battling teachers unions on the issues of both pension reform and Common Core Curriculum. He seems to govern practically, not ideologically.

Kasich also appears to have a strong independent streak. He is unappreciated by unions but workers love him. He is hated by the National Rifle Association but gun owners support him.

Now he does like to talk a lot–but so did that young Clinton fellow from Arkansas.

History may be on Kasich's side. Republicans typically nominate the most moderate candidate in the field. (The one exception since 1968 was Ronald Reagan, but he had the good fortune to be both the heir apparent–another GOP tradition–and the beneficiary of a split among moderate opponents.) Kasich will have to catch on in the primaries, which he can do because he doesn't have anywhere near the baggage most of his opponents have out there. And he can cause some real fear among Democrats who could be blindsided by a possible Kasich-Rubio, Kasich-Fiorini or a Kasich-Haley ticket.

John Kasich's announcement deserved a whole lot more attention than it got.

Bush leads Rubio in Sunshine State battle // CNN // Theodore Schleifer - July 24, 2015

The two Floridians running for president may be heading for a battle royale in their home state, and it looks as if Jeb Bush is currently on top.

Former Gov. Bush leads Florida Sen. Marco Rubio in the state's key Republican primary, according to a new Mason-Dixon poll released Friday. Bush earned 28% of Republicans' support, while Rubio, Bush's mentee, wins over 16% of those polled.

The two Floridians have overlapping donor networks and both rise from the same Miami-based political base. Some Republican strategists believe that only one of the two candidates will emerge as a top-tier contender after Florida's March 15 primary, which features several of the country's most expensive media markets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Previous polls have shown a narrower spread between Rubio and Bush, with the most recent Mason-Dixon survey in April revealing the distance between the pair to be just one percentage point. Rubio fell from 30% support to 16% since April, but Bush held steady in the Mason-Dixon poll.

Winning some of Rubio's support appears to be Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who earned 16% in the new Mason-Dixon poll, up from 2% in April. Following Walker in Friday's poll was businessman Donald Trump, who notched 11% support. All other candidates earned 5% or less in the survey.

Five hundred Republican voters were surveyed this week from Monday to Thursday with a margin of error of 4.5 percentage points.

Presidential Candidates Denounce Violence, but Avoid Talk of Policy // NYT // Jonathan Martin - July 24, 2015

The morning after the third deadly mass shooting in six weeks, the presidential candidates acted as though they had not seen the news.

Republicans attacked Hillary Rodham Clinton over the personal email account she used as secretary of state. Mrs. Clinton went ahead with a planned speech about tax policy. Senator Bernie Sanders, a rival Democrat, talked about children's issues in Iowa.

Only Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, speaking at a news conference outside the movie theater where three people were killed Thursday night, addressed the violence at length.

But Mr. Jindal, who is mounting a long-shot candidacy for the Republican nomination, completely deflected questions on tougher gun laws, saying he would talk about "policy and politics" another time, and telling reporters to focus on the victims, survivors and the heroic police officers who had responded to the shooting.

Law enforcement and other emergency personnel responded to the scene of the shooting.Gunman Kills 2 and Himself at Movie Theater in Lafayette, La.JULY 23, 2015

Though most denounced the shooting and called for prayers for the victims — as they did after recent shootings in Chattanooga, Tenn., and Charleston, S.C. — none of the presidential contenders offered policy solutions to address gun violence, a reflection of the fact that gun laws are politically radioactive.

The leading Republican presidential candidates are overwhelmingly opposed to any effort to restrict access to guns, and have responded to the string of recent shootings by focusing on — depending on the nature of the shooting — spiritual healing, the threat of Islamic terrorism and mental health efforts.

The Democratic hopefuls have proposed gun control measures, but they have been generally more focused on issues of economics, race and gender than gun violence.

In the wake of Thursday's attack, Mrs. Clinton made sure to acknowledge that "gun ownership is part of the fabric of many American communities," before urging broad policies to address gun violence.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We must come together for common sense gun violence prevention reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable, while respecting responsible gun owners," she said in a statement that was unlikely to offer encouragement to proponents of stricter gun laws.

Mrs. Clinton has, however, called for universal background checks and stronger efforts to block those who are on terrorist watch lists, suffer from mental illness, or have records of domestic abuse from obtaining firearms.

Though Mr. Sanders seems to be gaining ground based largely on the support of liberal voters, he is compromised on the issue of guns in a way that Mrs. Clinton is not. The Vermont senator has previously been backed by the National Rifle Association and has argued on the campaign trail that guns in his home state, or in rural New Hampshire, are not the equivalent of guns in major urban areas like Chicago. Mr. Sanders's campaign noted Friday that he supports instant background checks, tighter restrictions on gun shows and has a dismal rating from the N.R.A.

Among the Democratic contenders, only Martin O'Malley, who wrote an op-ed in The Boston Globe late Friday, made a forceful call for Congress to pass more restrictive gun measures.

Strategists in both parties say that, regardless of who wins the White House next year, there is little chance for passing gun legislation because Republicans, who will almost certainly still control the House, will not bring any bills restricting gun access up for a vote. The only times in recent American history when significant gun control bills were signed into law — 1968, 1993 and 1994 — were when Democrats controlled the presidency and both chambers of Congress.

Although President Obama said this week that the failure to persuade Congress to pass "common sense gun safety laws" was one of the great regrets of his presidency — just hours before the shooting in Louisiana — Congress is unlikely to close any of the loopholes in federal gun laws exposed by the recent shootings.

The bill in Congress with the most traction may be one that would give military officers the ability to carry weapons at recruitment centers.

Where Congress has faltered, the states have moved to tighten safety aspects of gun ownership. For instance, 10 states have made it harder for people with domestic violence convictions to obtain weapons.

Court records show that the gunman in Louisiana had a history of mental illness and had once been the subject of a protective order in Carroll County, Ga., which may have been detected with a stronger mental health reporting systems. That too is the subject of legislation languishing in Congress.

Nearly 20 states and the District of Columbia now have universal background check laws similar to a measure that failed in the last Congress, which may have blocked or at least slowed the gun purchase of Mohammod Youssuf Abdulazeez, who law enforcement officials say shot and killed four United States Marines and one sailor at a military recruitment center in Chattanooga. Mr. Abdulazeez bought his weapon on the Internet, an avenue that Senate legislation in the last Congress intended to make subject to background checks.

The man who the police say killed nine Charleston churchgoers had not completed his background check, but he was allowed to buy a gun anyway under a so-called default proceed. Federal law permits a firearms dealer who has initiated a background check to proceed with a sale if the dealer has not been notified of violations within three business days. Representative James E. Clyburn, Democrat of South Carolina, filed legislation that would close the loophole, but Republican leaders have not acted on it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the case of the Chattanooga killings, some of the candidates called for letting members of the military and National Guard arm themselves at recruiting centers, a move codified by bills pending in Congress. This week, Defense Secretary Ashton B. Carter responded coolly to the idea.

"We need to recruit, but we can't put people at unnecessary risk as well," he said, saying that he would await the recommendations of commanders, "and then I'll make decisions sometime in the next few days."

No single law usually could have prevented mass shootings, which remain rare. Gun violence experts are increasingly interested in changing laws to better target those who have a demonstrated propensity for gun violence. For instance, a nonviolent felony conviction from two decades ago may well be less predictive of gun violence than a domestic violence protection order or drunken-driving conviction, said Daniel Webster, director of the Johns Hopkins Center for Gun Policy and Research.

"There is very little research that says what the best gun policy is to prevent mass shootings," Mr. Webster said. "But we do have a good amount of research to show that when you have higher standards for legal gun ownership and more robust efforts needed to gain access you have much lower rates of gun violence. A lot of people have a hard time believing that because you never see a news story that some dangerous person didn't kill someone today because they didn't get a gun."

Tom Steyer: Candidates Who Want My Support Must Be Aggressive on Clean Energy // WSJ // Colleen McCain Nelson - July 24, 2015

Tom Steyer, the billionaire climate-change activist, laid out a litmus test for 2016 candidates Friday, calling on them to develop aggressive clean-energy plans.

Mr. Steyer set a high bar for candidates and elected officials seeking his support, asking for concrete plans to increase the share of clean energy in the United States' power generation mix to 50% by 2030.

"Reaching this goal would more than triple renewable energy in our country – putting us on the pathway to a 100% clean-energy economy by 2050 and millions of new jobs," Mr. Steyer wrote in a blog post.

The goal set by Mr. Steyer and his advocacy group, NextGen Climate, is more ambitious than President Barack Obama's pledge to achieve 20% renewable energy other than hydropower by 2030. Mr. Steyer called his newly announced target "a minimum starting point" for candidates who are committed to a clean-energy economy.

Mr. Steyer, who founded a hedge fund before shifting his focus to politics and philanthropy, has emerged as a consequential environmentalist who is willing to spend millions to elevate the issue of climate change. He spent $73 million during the 2014 midterm elections, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

A spokesperson for NextGen Climate made clear Friday that candidates who don't clear Mr. Steyer's bar on clean energy aren't likely to win the group's backing.

"NextGen Climate fully expects all candidates up and down the ballot to show the leadership we need, so it's hard to imagine supporting a candidate who doesn't embrace this goal," the group's spokesperson said.

While NextGen Climate issued a broad call for all candidates to lay out clean-energy plans, the message appeared aimed at prodding Democratic front runner Hillary Clinton, who has not yet detailed her own climate-change policy.

Other Democratic presidential candidates have been vocal about climate change on the stump. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has said the United States should zero out fossil fuels and be powered entirely by clean energy by 2050. Sen. Bernie Sanders has been a vocal opponent of the Keystone XL pipeline and has called for aggressive steps to combat climate change.

Red-state Democrats fret about leftward shift // Politico // Kyle Cheney - July 24, 2015

Centrist Democrats were wiped out in the 2014 elections and in their absence emerged a resurgent liberal movement, embodied most recently by the surprisingly competitive presidential campaign of Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders.

But the suddenly ascendant left — its populist overtones becoming part of the mainstream Democratic pitch — is worrying Democrats who want to compete on Republican-leaning turf. The party lost every competitive gubernatorial and Senate race in the South last year. And Democrats didn't fare much better in the heartland.

Now, as Bernie Sanders' surge foreshadows a new burst of progressivism, moderate Democrats are looking to their counterparts in Washington with a plea: Don't freeze us out.

"The national Democratic Party's brand makes it challenging for Democrats in red states oftentimes and I hope that going forward, the leaders at the national level will be mindful of that and they will understand that they can't govern the country without Democrats being able to win races in red states," said Paul Davis, who narrowly failed to unseat Republican Kansas Gov. Sam Brownback last year.

Davis and his ilk were partly victims of a historically dismal year for Democrats, who saw their gubernatorial ranks fall to 18. Their candidates were weighed down by perceptions that President Barack Obama was too liberal. Now, Democrats in red states are worried that the party's shift toward an even more polarizing, populist tone could turn off the swing voters they need to mount a comeback in 2015 and 2016, when a handful of GOP-tilted states with Democratic governors are on the ballot.

"It's important that the Democratic party be 'big-tent,'" said Vincent Sheheen, who lost last year to South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley. "So if the result of that kind of rhetoric is an antagonism toward or a hostility toward the moderate elements of the Democratic Party then yeah, it's big trouble and big problems."

"We'll never take back Congress unless we can win in the South. We'll never take back governorships unless we can win in the South," he added.

Though his state is fairly reliable for Democrats, Delaware Gov. Jack Markell told POLITICO he worries that overemphasizing liberal themes to turn out the Democratic base will backfire.

"There are still more self-described conservatives than there are self-described liberals," he said. "I think relying on a strategy where all you're trying to do is turn out your base of liberal Democrats is not a very compelling electoral strategy. I think what we need to do is we need to have a message that is compelling to Democrats, to independents, and even to some Republicans."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Georgia Democrat Jason Carter, the grandson of former president Jimmy Carter and the narrow loser of his state's 2014 governor's race, said the party would do well to preserve its inclusive image.

"Democrats in the South are the only truly 'big tent' party left," he said, adding that he expects that mentality to pay off in the near future. "The only real litmus test we have is that you have to want to be in the fight with all different kinds of people — and not exclude folks because of one or two issues."

Though Sanders has largely come to represent the restive left, supplanting liberal beacon Elizabeth Warren, the fear among moderate Democrats is not that he'll win their party's nomination — they're still confident Hillary Clinton will be the party's nominee — only that his supporters will tug the party so far away from the middle that there's no place for Southern moderates or Midwestern centrists.

The shift comes amid furious turnover for moderate Democrats at the gubernatorial level. Kentucky Gov. Steve Beshear is term-limited and the race to succeed him takes place in three months. Missouri's Jay Nixon and West Virginia's Earl Ray Tomblin are also term-limited and will see successors elected in 2016. Montana Gov. Steve Bullock is up for reelection next year.

These Democrats, who congregated here for the summer meeting of the National Governors Association, treaded cautiously around the issue, emphasizing repeatedly that energy within any faction of the party is a positive force that will aid Democrats across the ideological spectrum.

Tomblin predicted West Virginia Democrats would continue to run as "moderate to conservative" candidates and won't suffer from the pull of national politics. Beshear, whose preferred successor Jack Conway has bragged on the campaign trail about suing Obama over EPA regulations, underscored the importance of retaining the Democrats' big-tent mentality.

"We include viewpoints all across the political spectrum and that includes everything from the most liberal viewpoints to the most conservative viewpoints," he said. Beshear argued that Democrats' focus on common goals — job creation, improved education and access to health care — would keep the party united. "Those issues bring us all together and I think will serve as sort of the anchor of the party throughout future years."

Bullock, who heads the campaign organization tasked with electing Democratic governors this year, cited "roles for all of us" in the party, and Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe, a former national Democratic leader whose term expires after 2017, said "Anytime anyone brings any energy to a political process, it's a good thing."

Democrats were also quick to deflect from their internal debate with a quick reference to Donald Trump. For all their ideological squabbling, they noted, the Republican Party is far more fractious and still struggling to find its identity.

"If you look at the difference among Democratic candidates on their core message, their core issues, I mean there is much less difference than what we see from extreme parts of the spectrum of Republican candidates," said Mark Schauer, who lost last year's Michigan governor's race against Rick Snyder and is now leading Democratic efforts to retake state legislatures.

Yet Democrats are mindful of how easily Republicans managed to tag local and statewide candidates as pawns of national leaders deeply unpopular in Republican-leaning states.

"Nancy Pelosi in South Carolina does not play well," said Sheheen. "We need to have moderate figureheads in the party who can speak to people and relate to people in the south. If the message is a less mainstream message, if it is a more extreme message, then that would be a problem."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One Democratic operative who works with gubernatorial candidates argued that the Democratic Party must avoid a slide into factionalism that mirrors the rise of the tea party on the right.

"The Democratic Party cannot become what the Republican Party is today – a fractured party with the tea party crazies on one side and the libertarian loonies on the other," the operative said. "We have to be able to embrace all."

Ways of seeing // Economist // July 24, 2015

The presidential candidates' ideas for boosting wages reveal different diagnoses of how the economy has changed over the past 40 years

With unemployment low, decent growth anticipated for this year and the Federal Reserve preparing to raise interest rates, America's economy looks rosier. That has not stopped candidates for president from worrying about it. With the economy back on its feet, the presidential hopefuls want to address a longer-term condition: stagnant wages. Median household incomes remain lower in real terms than in 1989, and only 11% higher than in 1970. Talk of the death of the American dream is rife. The candidates have suggested a variety of reviving strategies, each of which reveals a different diagnosis of the underlying problem.

The first idea is to boost growth. Most economists reckon GDP rose by around an annualised 2.5% in the second quarter—strong, by today's standards. But it lags the pace achieved, say, from 1996 to 2000, when annual growth topped 3.5%, and real median incomes grew by 10% to boot.

Jeb Bush, the front-runner for the Republican nomination, wants a repeat of this superlative economic performance, and is promising to target growth of 4%. With such a fast expansion, argues Mr Bush, "the middle class will thrive again".

That is probably true, but the ambitious target has raised plenty of eyebrows among economists, many of whom think the economy's potential for growth is permanently lower today. Mr Bush's plan is light on details, but in an interview with a New Hampshire newspaper on July 8th he said part of the solution might be for Americans to work longer hours. The Democrats immediately lambasted him as out of touch; Americans already toil for longer than any other workers in the G7 group of large rich countries.

Mr Bush may have a point all the same. There are 6.4m Americans in part-time jobs who want to work full-time, up from 4.5m on the eve of the recession. The Federal Reserve reckons these workers form part of the slack in the labour market which holds wage growth down. Still, it is not clear what Mr Bush could do about this, were he to win the White House. Labour-market slack is a short-run issue that is usually the domain of the Fed.

A more promising approach is to try to boost productivity in the hours already worked—another natural way to get wages up. In a thoughtful speech on July 7th Marco Rubio, one of Mr Bush's many rivals for the Republican nomination, focused on this route to riches. The plight of the middle class was not, he said, the result of a cyclical economic downturn. Instead, Americans need help adapting to the new world of high-tech jobs. Just as textile workers in the industrial revolution had to retrain to learn to use the power loom, and became richer as a result, Americans today will thrive only if they learn to harness the tools of the global techno-economy.

To that end, Mr Rubio wants to overhaul higher education. A four-year college course is unnecessary for many students, and too expensive for workers looking for new skills, he argues. Mr Rubio wants to make it easier to set up cheaper, shorter courses and break what he calls the “cartel” of colleges controlling accreditation. He would also introduce a new funding model for students, who could offer up a fixed percentage of their future incomes to investors willing to finance their studies.

Boosting skills and productivity is necessary to increase wages. But Hillary Clinton, the probable Democratic nominee, likes to point out that this is not, on its own, enough. Americans have not reaped the fruits of their labour in recent decades Since 1970, productivity has more than doubled, while median incomes have risen only 11% (see chart).

That makes the problem look like one of pie-cutting rather than pie-cooking. The labour share—the proportion of GDP that flows to the pockets of workers—has been in decline since the turn of the century, with capital gobbling up an increasing share of the economy’s spoils. Mrs Clinton wants to arrest this trend by encouraging firms to share profits with workers. She would offer a two-year tax credit to firms that do so, worth up to 15% of whatever was paid out. The hope is to nudge firms towards schemes that they will continue after the tax break is withdrawn. The firms may find this is good for them: there is strong evidence that profit-sharing boosts productivity, argues Joseph Blasi, an economist at Rutgers University who advised the Clinton campaign on the policy.

Pie-eyed

One problem is that wages may fall to offset the profit share. To begin with, this would be spotted easily. But over time it would be harder to detect (for instance, wages might grow at a slower pace with profit-sharing in place). The only way of ensuring that workers shared company profits in the long-run would be to encourage employee ownership of firms.

Mrs Clinton’s challengers on the left have a more rudimentary approach. Both Martin O’Malley, a former governor of Maryland, and Bernie Sanders, a senator from Vermont, say they will more than double the federal minimum wage from $7.25 to $15 an hour. Seattle, Los Angeles and San Francisco are already phasing in such a policy. On July 22nd a panel of experts recommended a $15 minimum wage for fast-food workers in New York. A much higher minimum wage would boost median incomes, because many low-wage workers are their household’s second earners. But the minimum wage is a blunt instrument, and economists know little about the long-run impact these increases would have on employment (see article).

The candidates do not seem short of ideas to improve the fortunes of average Americans. And the renewed focus on wages is welcome; economic growth matters little if it does not boost living standards. Most of the front-line candidates have correctly identified the causes of the malaise (Scott Walker, who sees no problem, is an exception). But slower growth, weak productivity and a declining labour share of income are global trends. The next president will need to fight all three.

Why Bernie Sanders & Donald Trump represent a perfect storm for American politics // Salon // Matthew Pulver - July 24, 2015

Donald Trump and Bernie Sanders are not the same. At all. Sanders is not the Trump of the left, and vice versa. I feel uncomfortable even joining them in the same sentence. But the two campaigns’ shocking early successes do reflect the same growing helplessness and anger at a Washington many increasingly feel to be distant, unresponsive, dynastic and unconcerned with regular citizens’ lives. We’re finding that if you’re a truth-to-power speaker, there’s a ready-made following in each party. At least, Trump’s freewheeling, shoot-from-the-hip disdain for GOP leaders (and Democrats when he gets around to it) looks like speaking truth to power to followers; and Sanders is stubbornly reminding his party’s leadership about its mistakes. They’re both tapping into the same bipartisan well of unhappiness with our government. Trust in government is at its lowest sustained trough since Pew started collecting that data in 1958, and Trump and Sanders represent a radical choice in each party, each man an outsider against establishment favorites named Clinton and Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Neither Trump nor Sanders even belongs to the party for whose nomination he runs. Trump said he identified "more as Democrat" in 2004, declined to affiliate with the party in 2012, and up until the 2012 election had given "significantly more money to Democrats." Sanders is proudly an Independent. He describes himself as a "democratic socialist" and boasted in April that he is "outside of the two-party system, defeating Democrats and Republicans."

So neither feels the need then to play ball according to party rules. They weren't reared in their parties. Trump has gone on a rampage against GOP establishment figures like John McCain and Lindsey Graham recently, which has been verboten and in breach of Reagan's "Eleventh Commandment" that "thou shalt not speak ill of any fellow Republican." But the recent ad hominem and dirty internecine attacks of the sort hitherto reserved for Democratic opponents actually boosted Trump's poll numbers and sent him firmly into the frontrunner position.

Bernie Sanders is the anti-Trump and committed to not personally attack Hillary Clinton. He prides himself on his career-long avoidance of such tactics. "I've never run a negative ad in my life," he told The Nation's John Nichols earlier this month. "I'm supposed to be telling the people that my opponents are the worst people in the world and I'm great," he said. "That's crap; I don't believe that for a second…" But his leftist critique constitutes a gigantic subtweet against the Clintons, whose centrism has defined the direction of the party since the early '90s, if not the late '80s. He doesn't have to name the Clintons to be attacking virtually their entire political project.

Sanders often boasts that he's "the longest serving independent in the history of the U.S. Congress," and in 2006 he became the first socialist ever elected to the U.S. Senate. He's running as a Democrat only because that's the only lane available to make a meaningful run at the White House in a political duopoly.

Both are true outsiders. If nominated, Trump would be the first Republican candidate never to have served in elective office since Eisenhower, who did have a little gig as Supreme Allied Commander in WWII but no elective position. Republican nominee Wendell Willkie in 1940 is the last to have not served in government before his run. Sanders, of course, would be the first socialist president and complete the dream of Eugene V. Debs, the early 20th century socialist presidential candidate who garnered nearly a million votes in 1920.

In recent decades, there have been a few outsider-like candidates who have done well in primaries, but not actual outsiders like Trump and Sanders. Republican Pat Buchanan in 1996 was something of a well-performing wild card, but he was a party man, serving in both the Nixon and Reagan administrations. Democrat Howard Dean was labeled an "outsider" in 2004 and enjoyed some unlikely success early in the primaries. But Dean wasn't actually an outsider. The former Vermont governor went on to chair the Democratic National Committee, the organization "responsible for governing the Democratic Party." So the most insider position there is, basically. Jesse Jackson's run in 1988 is probably the closest modern-era comparison to this election's two outsiders, but Jackson, it turned out, represented the last gasp of the liberal wing of the Democratic Party for two decades, not the resurgence that Sanders' campaign represents.

The 1988 primaries do share some similarities with this election's surprising early showings by Sanders and Trump. Jackson's more radical, outsider campaign did, like Sanders', have a conservative counterpart in televangelist Pat Robertson, who could be thought of as the Trump. The two outsiders won 12 state primaries between them.

But in 1988 there wasn't the same populist anger that's marked the last 6 or 7 years. The Tea Party and Occupy Wall Street, whatever your opinion of the two movements, were manifestations of a deep distrust of Washington that transcended party. The spark that ignited what would become the Tea Party occurred under a Republican president: the rejection of President Bush's Wall Street bailout in 2008, a Republican-led "stunning defiance of President Bush and Congressional leaders of both parties." Occupy was born under Obama in 2011 and presented a progressive challenge to the Democratic establishment. Both movements initiated a new period of intra-party conflict in each of Washington's two political houses.

The electorate of both parties is, as a result, accustomed to internecine fighting in a way that's been absent. No longer is it simply the other party and its leadership to blame for our ills but voters' own party leadership. The last several elections have seen “almost unprecedented” political carnage on the Republican side by Tea Party insurgents, and Senator Elizabeth Warren and Sanders form the beginnings of a progressive antagonist wing of the Democratic Party.

It’s a perfect storm. With nearly every measure of trust and approval of Washington showing historic levels of disdain with the establishment, the two parties proffer a Bush and a Clinton as the most likely nominees. Bush and Clinton’s fundraising utterly dominate everyone else in the field, and each party’s base sees machinations and string-pulling. Neither Trump nor Sanders will sit in the Oval Office unless invited by the next president, but it’s time to start paying attention to the anger. Party leaders can dismiss Trump and Sanders, but they shouldn’t dismiss the millions they represent. All a rabble needs is a good rouser. Neither candidate is right for that job, but there is almost certainly someone out there who is, someone with a 2020 vision.

Hillary Clinton Classified // WSJ // July 24, 2015

When Hillary Clinton called a press conference on March 10 to defend her use of private email for official State Department business, she was categorical in saying that as Secretary of State she “did not email any classified material to anyone on my email. There is no classified material.”

Mark that down as another Clinton untruth, along with coming under fire on a tarmac in Bosnia, suddenly discovering the Rose Law Firm billing records in the upstairs bedroom after years of saying they’d been lost, earning a 10,000% profit trading cattle futures after having read the Wall Street Journal, and so many more.

A government review has now found that Mrs. Clinton sent at least four emails from her personal account that contained classified information during her time as Secretary of State. The content should have been labeled “secret,” the second level of classification, according to a letter sent to Congress by the Inspector General for the intelligence community. Those four emails came from a mere 40 that the IG inspected. There are 30,000 more emails the IG hasn’t reviewed, according to a story Friday in the Journal.

This is no small slip-up, and the intelligence IG and his State Department counterpart have referred the handling of Mrs. Clinton’s email to the Justice Department for review. Other senior officials have faced criminal charges for misusing classified information. Former CIA Director David Petraeus pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor this year for disclosing classified information to his mistress, while Clinton-era National Security Adviser Sandy Berger copped a misdemeanor plea in 2005 for walking off with classified documents from the National Archives.

The latest revelation adds to the scandal of Mrs. Clinton’s private emails, which by now would have crippled a lesser figure running for President. Mrs. Clinton first said she wanted to use a private server so she could use a single electronic device. Then we learned she had more than one device anyway.

She claimed she had turned over all of her private emails to the State Department to review and release to the public. Then we learned that she had failed to turn over some Benghazi-related emails to her outside political fixer, Sidney Blumenthal. We only learned about the emails she didn’t turn over because Mr. Blumenthal gave them under subpoena to the Congressional committee investigating the 2012 terror attack in Benghazi.

As usual, Mrs. Clinton didn’t acknowledge her previous falsehood when asked about it on Friday, attempting to change the subject. “Maybe the heat is getting to everybody,” Mrs. Clinton said. “We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right, and I will do my part. But I’m also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families.”

If the Clinton pattern holds, her campaign will eventually admit she "misspoke," but it will say it was inadvertent, the breaches were minor, and what difference does it make anyway? But it makes a huge difference in regard to the honesty and judgment Americans expect in a President.

Mrs. Clinton took an enormous risk to national security by putting her official emails on a private server. Sooner or later she was certain to send or receive some information useful to foreign governments even if it wasn't officially classified. Every intelligence expert we've talked to says it is close to a certainty that some foreign intelligence agency was able to hack her emails while she was America's chief diplomat.

Her reason for taking this risk was most likely because she didn't want those emails to become public if she ran for President. And she admits she destroyed thousands of emails that she says—please take her word for it—weren't official business.

One of this week's big political stories is that Mrs. Clinton is now trailing three GOP presidential candidates in head-to-head polling in three swing states. More dangerous for Democrats, a majority in those states say they don't believe Mrs. Clinton is honest or trustworthy. Perhaps that's because she has proven so often that she isn't.

Hillary Clinton Rebuffs Liberals' Push to Break Up Banks // WSJ // Laura Meckler - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner for president, said she would not be pushed by liberals in her party to advocate for a breakup of big banks or the reinstatement of the Glass-Steagall law that separated commercial and investment banking.

In response to a question about Glass-Steagall, she said: "I think it's a more complicated assessment than any one piece of legislation might suggest."

Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who are challenging her for the Democratic nomination, are both advocating a breakup of the banks. Mrs. Clinton suggested that was a simplistic response and promised to lay out her plan for Wall Street regulation at a future date. It isn't expected to include anything that sweeping.

Mr. Sanders in particular has gained traction with liberals in the party pushing for a big populist platform and a crackdown on what he calls the "billionaire class."

Mrs. Clinton said that people advocating for new bank rules should remember that it was not just banks, but mortgage companies, insurance companies and non-commercial banking entities who were "as big if not bigger contributors to the collapse" of the financial system.

"So I am not interested in just saying there is one answer to the too-big-to-fail problem, we have a too-big-to-fail problem still and we have to figure out the best way to address it and I'm going to be talking more about that," she told reporters at the end of a day of campaigning in South Carolina.

She also emphasized the importance of defending the 2010 Dodd-Frank legislation that added new regulations and suggested the real contrast was with Republicans who want to roll that back.

On a related subject, on Friday in New York City, she plans a speech on corporate responsibility and how to encourage long-term thinking and discourage what she calls "quarterly capitalism." Asked how she thinks the Wall Street banks will respond, she said she didn't know.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think I'm proposing policies that will make our economy stronger, that will promote both strong growth and fair growth but will do so with a longer-term perspective," she said. "That's what I think is best for the country. I think it's also best for business whether they agree with it or not."

Earlier, during a question-and-answer session with the public, she said she still thinks a two-state solution is the only way to resolve the conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians and if elected president she'd "go right back at it" in trying to reach a peace deal.

It was a rare appearance for foreign policy on the campaign trail for the former secretary of state. She mentioned that while in office, she was able to "bring together" Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and the U.S. envoy to the region, George Mitchell, for three face-to-face meetings.

"We sat there for several hours and I could see that there were opportunities to bridge some of these really difficult gaps," she said. She said that "some difficulties that I won't get into" since then have made it harder but vowed to try again. "There is no alternative and I will continue to work for that."

In Greenville, Mrs. Clinton also gave a rare shout-out to a pro-immigration Republican, South Carolina's Lindsey Graham. Mrs. Clinton typically attacks all GOP presidential candidates as opposing a path to citizenship for people in the country illegally, even though Mr. Graham has been a leading supporter of just such a policy.

On Thursday, asked about immigration by an audience member, she mentioned the 2013 comprehensive overhaul that went through the Senate, though it died in the House.

"Your senior senator, Lindsey Graham, was instrumental," she said. "I really respected the way he defended that when he ran for re-election."

Here Are Hillary Clinton's Proposed Capital-Gains Tax Rates // WSJ // July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton is proposing a sharp increase in the capital-gains tax rate for the highest earners for investments held only a few years, a campaign official said Friday. This is part of her push to combat what she sees as too short-term a focus by American companies and investors. The campaign's proposal would affect the top 0.5% of taxpayers, hitting top-bracket single filers with taxable income above $413,201 and married couples filing jointly with taxable income above $484,850.

In Clinton email inquiry, a changing story // Politico // Dylan Byers - July 24, 2015

The New York Times' report about a potential investigation into Hillary Clinton's State Department email account has undergone multiple revisions in the hours since it was published, due to mistakes made by both the Times and the Justice Department, the On Media blog has learned.

The most significant error rests with the Justice Department: multiple sources with knowledge of the situation said that the DOJ told the Times on Thursday that the Intelligence Community Inspector General had sought a criminal investigation into the mishandling of sensitive government information in connection with Clinton's personal email account. (On Friday, the DOJ also initially told other news organizations the referral was "criminal.")

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But hours later, the DOJ reversed course: "The Department has received a referral related to the potential compromise of classified information. It is not a criminal referral," the Department said in a statement. DOJ spokesperson Melanie Newman said she would not comment further.

The Director of National Intelligence's office also said Friday that the Intelligence Community Inspector General's referral was not criminal: "An important distinction is that the Intelligence Community Inspector General didn't make a criminal referral – it was a counterintelligence referral to the proper office at the FBI. It's up to them how to proceed," DNI spokesperson Andrea Williams said.

That distinction will likely force the Times to once again alter a report (and headline) that it was already forced to change late Thursday night, after the Clinton campaign complained to the Times that the article had mischaracterized the former Secretary of State's position in the investigation.

As previously reported, the Times initially reported that two inspectors general -- the IC IG and the State IG -- had asked the Justice Department to open a criminal investigation "into whether Hillary Rodham Clinton mishandled sensitive government information on a private email account she used as secretary of state." That clause, which suggested Clinton was a target in the potential criminal probe, was later changed to eliminate that suggestion: the inquiry was now into "whether sensitive government information was mishandled in connection with the personal email account."

The Times initially provided no update, notification, clarification or correction explaining the changes made to the article, its headline or its URL. Early Friday morning, Times reporter Michael Schmidt said that the Clinton campaign had complained about the story to the Times: "It was a response to complaints we received from the Clinton camp that we thought were reasonable, and we made them," he said.

On Friday afternoon, the Times issued a correction acknowledging that it had "misstated the nature of the referral to the Justice Department regarding Hillary Clinton's personal email account while she was secretary of state. The referral addressed the potential compromise of classified information in connection with that personal email account. It did not specifically request an investigation into Mrs. Clinton."

As of 4 p.m. on Friday, the Times article and its headline still stated that the referral was "criminal," despite the DOJ and IC IG claims to the contrary.

Meanwhile, the Times' claim that two inspectors general sought an inquiry also came into question on Friday afternoon after Jennifer Werner, a Democratic spokesperson for the Select Committee on Benghazi, told the On Media blog that the State Inspector General "did not ask for any kind of investigation, criminal or otherwise." Werner said the referral "went from the Intelligence Community IG to the FBI," and that the Times was therefore wrong to report that two inspectors general had sought the investigation.

New York Times spokesperson Eileen Murphy has yet to respond to requests for comment regarding the changes to the Times report.

The Clinton campaign now claims that the Times' reporting has been "discredited."

"It is now more clear than ever that the New York Times report claiming there is a criminal inquiry sought in Hillary Clinton's use of email is false," campaign spokesperson Nick Merrill said in a statement. "It has now been discredited both by the Justice Department and the Ranking Member of the House Oversight Committee. This incident shows the danger of relying on reckless, inaccurate leaks from partisan sources."

But much of the substance of the story remains true. The IC IG has made a referral to the Justice Department for an investigation. Moreover, the Wall Street Journal has since reported that an internal government review "found that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton sent at least four emails from her personal account containing classified information during her time heading the State Department."

During a speech at New York University on Friday afternoon, Clinton addressed the controversy.

"I want to say a word about what's in the news today. It's because there have been a lot of inaccuracies," Clinton said. "We all have a responsibility to get this right. I have released 55,000 pages of emails. I have said repeatedly that I will answer questions before the House committee. We are all accountable to get the facts right. I will do my part. But I'm also going to stay focused on the issues, particularly the big issues that really matter to American families."

Hillary Clinton's latest e-mail mess // NY Post // Editorial Board - July 24, 2015

So much for Hillary Clinton's claim last March that "there is no classified material" on the private e-mail server she used for official business as secretary of state.

A review by two inspectors general found that four of just 40 e-mails sampled (out of 30,000-plus) contained material that should have been marked "secret," the second-highest classification level.

And unlike material only later deemed classified, these e-mails were — at least, in effect — "classified when they were sent and are classified now," according to a spokeswoman.

Which is why the intelligence community's inspector general referred the matter to the FBI's counterintelligence division, according to The Wall Street Journal.

Justice Department sources initially confirmed that the referral was criminal in nature — though, late Friday, the agency reversed course without explanation.

The two IGs confirmed they'd made a "security referral for counterintelligence purposes." They said the e-mails "should have been handled as classified, appropriately marked and transmitted via secure network" and "should never have been transmitted" over Clinton's private server.

All of which puts Hillary's longstanding claim about not sending sensitive information via her server in doubt. And whether her goal was to thumb her nose at calls for transparency or, as she preposterously claims, for mere convenience, her private e-mail system was clearly an abuse.

What's more, this may be just the start: The results of this limited review suggest hundreds of other e-mails may contain classified information as well. (As for those Team Hillary decided were irrelevant and destroyed, the public may never know.)

Again: Hillary's private server represented an outrageous flouting of the rules. Since its discovery, she's been anything but forthright.

"We are all accountable to the American people to get the facts right," Hillary insisted Friday. We'd say it's long past time that principle were applied to her.

Uber Shows That 20th-Century Policies Aren't Right For A 21st-Century Economy // Forbes // Andrew Clark - July 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A simple question: Are Uber, Lyft, Airbnb and other companies in the sharing economy modern examples of entrepreneurial innovation? Or are they examples of the free market run amok?

Taxi drivers, union members and civic groups hold a news conference and rally on the steps of City Hall to support a City Council move to limit the number of Uber drivers and other for-hire car companies on the streets of New York City. (Photo by Spencer Platt/Getty Images)

Unfortunately for Millennials, a growing number of policymakers see it as the latter. During her first major economic policy speech last week, Hillary Clinton proposed to "crack down" on companies in the sharing economy that are threatening Americans' well-being by supposedly "exploiting" workers through their business models.

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio was quick to follow suit. This week, he called for temporarily capping the number of new for-hire drivers—read: Uber and Lyft drivers—out of concerns for environmental quality and bad traffic, among other things. But after four days of intense backlash (which even included an Uber app setting called "de Blasio" that showed no available rides), he ultimately backed down.

The economy is moving forward – and we can't be left behind

This is nonsense. A far greater threat to Americans' well-being are policies like Clinton's and de Blasio's that apply a 20th century framework to a 21st century economy. Such an outdated approach will only stall the progress of future generations.

Simply put, the sharing economy shows how free markets create new products and opportunities that better people's lives.

It's also an example of what should be the 21st century model of government: getting out of the way of tech-driven innovation. Services like Uber, Airbnb and others allow for private individuals to interact with one another with little government interference. If you like the services—as either the provider or consumer—you'll use them again; if you don't, you won't.

Americans have embraced the sharing economy

Americans' choices speak for themselves. Airbnb has served over 30 million guests since 2008, while Uber had 162,000 drivers as of January of this year. These companies are providing jobs for people who need them. That's especially important for Millennials who face a youth unemployment rate of nearly 14%.

In fact, this new economy is achieving what even the best-intentioned government policies rarely do: raising wages and providing greater worker freedoms.

Uber drivers in six of its largest cities—New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Boston and Washington, D.C.—make an average of $19.06 per hour, nearly triple the current federal minimum wage and more than the $15 minimum wage some activists are demanding. It's also 48% more than the average taxi cab driver's $12.90 per hour. Some Uber drivers make up to $90,000 a year.

The sharing economy also provides other freedoms hardly imaginable in the 20th century. Forget the 9-5, Uber drivers can make their schedules as they please.

Uber has disrupted the absurdities of the taxi industry

Even more telling is the number of cab drivers trading in their taxis for Uber stickers. Taxis have long been among the most heavily regulated industries in the country, with local cab commissions operating like cartels. In places like New York, these commissions have driven up the cost of taxi medallions (essentially licenses for doing business) to over $1 million.

Enter Uber. Since it exploded in the New York market, the price of taxi medallions has fallen by 23% from its 2013 highs. All drivers had to do was make a choice.

Government stands in the way of innovation

And that's the biggest point about the sharing economy. It didn't require laws or regulations to increase wages and worker freedoms. It took government getting out of the way. When individuals can decide when, where and how they work, they are capable of improving their own lives more than any government policy.

This makes Clinton's embrace of 20th century economics all the more puzzling. Many of her policies—like a minimum wage increase, support for labor unions and an expanded welfare state—are tired relics of the past. While the sharing economy prospers because it doesn't rely on government, those policies are fatally flawed because they do.

Hillary Unveils Her Wonky Plan to Jack Up Taxes on Rich Investors // Slate // Jordan Weissman - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton has unveiled what might be the first truly interesting economic proposal of her presidential campaign. Today during a speech in New York, she detailed a plan to hike taxes on income from investments that high-income Americans hold for less than six years. It is part of a broader platform designed to fight what she refers to as "quarterly capitalism"—corporate America's focus on maintaining short-term prefits in order to appease shareholders. "American business needs to break free from the tyranny of today's earnings report," Clinton said. Frankly, a few of the ideas she brought up—such as more elaborate disclosure rules regarding executive pay and stronger disclosure rules on stock buybacks—seemed a bit limp. But the tax increase on investors could become a defining issue.

Most obviously, because it's a tax increase. Republican contenders like Marco Rubio and Rand Paul have argued for eliminating taxes on investment income altogether, a move that would overwhelmingly benefit wealthier households. (New York University economist Edward Wolff calculates that, in 2013, the top 10 percent of U.S. households owned 81.4 percent of all stocks.) Hillary is officially moving in the opposite direction.

Here's how it would work. Today, when Americans sell stocks or bonds that they have held for less than a year, it's taxed as normal income. If they hold it for more than a year, they pay the lower long-term capital gains rate, which technically maxes out at 20 percent. (However, high earners also pay an additional 3.8 percent surcharge under Obamacare, so the final number is really 23.8 percent.)

Clinton argues, very reasonably, that it's silly to consider everything a long-term investment after just a year. Instead, she wants to the capital gains rate to decline gradually, so that the longer people hold their stocks, bonds, and mutual funds, the less they pay after cashing them in. For Americans in the top tax bracket, the government would tax investments sold after less than two years like ordinary income. Then, over the next four years, the rate would fall back down toward 20 percent (you have to add the 3.8 percent Obama surcharge onto each of these numbers to get the total tax amount). None of this would affect people outside the highest bracket.

Again, Hillary is couching this change to the tax code as a way to prod investors into thinking long-term, rather than push companies to cut investment and pay out dividends to enrich their shareholders at the expense of future growth. It might work. It might not. But, ultimately, it's a progressive tax increase on investment income, and that should make many progressives happy. Regardless of whether it changes investors's behavior, it will raise some money from the wealthy, especially given that the average stock is currently held for less than a year.

Inevitably, conservatives will argue that the plan is a job killer. In general, the right maintains that raising on capital gains (or corporate dividends) is a wrongheaded, because it will dissuade individuals people from investing in companies and saving, which will in turn cause companies to invest less on their operations. Suffice to say, it's far from clear that's true.

If you simply chart the top capital gains rate against economic growth, there isn't much of an obvious pattern. Given the vast number of factors at play in the economy at a given moment, it's extremely difficult for economists to design credible studies singling out the effects of the investment taxes, which, as the Congressional Research Service has noted, actually have a very small effect on how much it ultimately costs companies to fund themselves. However, a clever paper by University of California, Berkeley professor Danny Yagan found that the Bush administration's 2003 dividend tax cut had no effect on corporate investment. Yagan looked at the way companies organized as C-Corporations, which were affected by the changed, reacted compared to those organized as S-Corporations, which were not affected. Long story short: There wasn't much of a difference.

So here's the potential upside of Hillary's plan: It's a tax increase that will raise a bit of revenue and dampen some of the worst impulses of investors without risking much in the way of growth.

Economic merits aside, parts of Wall Street will obviously hate and oppose this idea. But maybe not all of it. As I wrote earlier this week, some major figures in finance, like BlackRock CEO Larry Fink, have argued that short-termism has become a crisis that threatens to undermine capitalism. It's possible that other money managers who subscribe to his buy-and-hold approach to investing might get behind Clinton's idea, if only because it would give them an advantage over competitors with a shorter horizon.

Ultimately, Clinton's proposal sets us up for a campaign-season debate about how the country should treat the money people earn from investing versus the money people earn from their work. Given the declining share of the nation's income that's going to labor, it's one of the most essential questions we could ask about inequality right now.

Tom Steyer Just Gave Hillary Millions of Reasons to Get Specific on Climate // Slate // Josh Voorhees - July 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton has promised to make global warming a key pillar of her 2016 campaign but, much to the frustration of the climate crowd, she hasn't gone into any detail about how she'd actually address the problem as president. On Friday the biggest individual spender (non–dark money category) in the midterm elections suggested that's going to have to change if the Democratic front-runner wants the backing of his well-funded super PAC.

Tom Steyer, a hedge fund manager-turned-environmental activist, announced that his NextGen Climate Action group will only back candidates in 2016 who push energy policies aimed at having half of the nation's electricity generated from renewable or zero-carbon sources by 2030, and 100 percent by 2050. "That's the hurdle candidates have to get over to win our support," the billionaire told the New York Times. The creation of such a clear, public litmus test is surprising—particularly since earlier this year Steyer held a private fundraiser for Clinton in his San Francisco home.

So far this year, NextGen has largely focused its efforts on the Republican field by trying to put the candidates on record about not believing that man is a significant contributor to global warming. Friday's announcement, though, is aimed directly at the Democratic side of the field—and Clinton specifically. Hillary's top two rivals are already in Steyer's good graces: Martin O'Malley laid out his plans last month for a shift to 100 percent renewable electricity by the middle of this century, while Bernie Sanders often talks forcefully on the stump about what needs to be done to curb climate change. (Whether Sanders will be willing to release a specific plan tailored to NextGen's request, though, remains in question given the Vermont senator's general disdain for billionaire donors.)

Clinton, though, has taken a more moderate, let's-not-move-too-fast position that has angered many in the climate community, which has long been upset over her unwillingness to speak out against the Keystone XL pipeline. Clinton's strongest climate comments to date were a promise to fight to preserve the regulations being implemented by President Obama's U.S. Environmental Protection Agency at "all costs." That was welcome news to climate activists but hardly something for them to get excited about. They've long pushed for Obama to go bigger on climate, and they want Clinton to make promises that go beyond more of the same.

As I've noted before, Clinton doesn't have to pay much heed to your run-of-the-mill climate activist in the primary given that she won't have to worry about them come the general. Their legitimate fears about a climate science–denying Republican president will be a much greater motivating force on Election Day than their doubts about Clinton ever could be. But Steyer's vow could force Clinton's hand. He donated $67 million of his own cash to his NextGen Climate Action super PAC in 2014 (without much to show for it). While he hasn't said how much he's willing to spend this cycle, a NextGen spokeswoman told the Times that he intends to "double down." If he does, he'll give Clinton millions of more reasons to finally get specific on an issue she's so far been treating as a political advantage as opposed to a real-world problem.

Review of Hillary Clinton's Capital Gains Tax Proposal // Forbes // Bernie Kent - July 24, 2015

In a speech in New York City today, Hillary Clinton set forth a proposal to increase the holding period needed to obtain the lower tax rates applicable to long-term capital gains. Her proposal apparently applies only to that portion of a taxpayer's income that would otherwise be taxed at the 39.6% tax bracket. For 2015, this would apply only to income in excess of $464,850 for married taxpayers filing jointly and $413,200 for single taxpayers.

Hillary's proposal extends the one year holding period for long-term capital gains rates to a two to six year period, with a sliding scale to obtain the lower long-term capital gains rates:

after 2 years, 36%

after 3 years, 32%

after 4 years, 28%

after 5 years, 24%.

After a six year holding period, the long-term capital gains tax rate for the capital gains in excess of the highest tax bracket threshold would be taxed at 20%, as it is now. Of course the capital gains would still be subject to the 3.8% Obamacare tax on net investment income, the approximately 1.2% impact of the "Pease Tax" and any state income tax that might apply. It is a fair presumption that these higher rates and holding periods would also apply for purposes of Alternative Minimum Tax, but that the higher rates would not apply to qualified dividends, since there is no holding period for dividends.

There are several dimensions on which to evaluate this proposal: impact on the economy, impact on tax revenue, fairness and complexity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Economic Impact

Hillary Clinton said that the purpose of her proposal is to discourage the tendency of public companies to emphasize short-term performance over long-term performance. I fail to see how lengthening the long-term capital gain holding period for the highest bracket taxpayers will reduce emphasis on quarterly performance. There is really no link between quarterly earnings reports and the tax rates applicable to stocks held for two to six years. A one year holding period more than adequately addresses the issue of short-term speculation. There is no reason to think that a two to six year holding period will reduce emphasis on quarterly earnings. Remember that a decent portion of the publicly traded shares are held by tax exempt entities such as endowments and pension plans. These funds are concerned about long-term performance already. On the other hand, those money managers and investors who currently focus on short term performance will not be deterred from this behavior by a holding period that they currently fail to meet. Even if this proposal increases the holding period of a few high bracket investors (and I think it might), how will this affect the behavior of CEOs who are focused on quarterly performance at the expense of long-term performance? I see very little economic impact from this proposal, other than that a few of the highest bracket individuals may hold a few investments slightly longer.

Revenue Impact

The timing of paying capital gains taxes is generally determined by the investor. Only rarely is an investor forced to sell stock due to a cash buyout. Some high bracket taxpayers may delay the recognition of capital gains if Hillary's proposal is enacted. This may offset the revenue gained by the higher rates. The Clinton campaign is not looking to this proposal as a revenue raiser. It is unclear how this proposal would impact charitable contributions of appreciated long-term capital gains property, for which taxpayers can deduct the full fair market value of the contributed asset. If the taxpayer contributes an asset to charity which does not meet the holding period for long-term capital gains tax, the taxpayer can only deduct the cost basis of the asset, not the fair market value. Will Mrs. Clinton's proposal require a one, two or six year holding period to be able to deduct the full fair market value of an asset contributed to charity?

Fairness

One of the arguments in favor of lower tax rates for long-term capital gains is that the nominal gain is not the same as the real gain, due to the impact of inflation. If you bought an asset such as stock or real estate 50 years ago for $100,000 and sold it today for $250,000, you would have a nominal gain of $150,000 on which you would have to pay tax. However to replace the purchasing power of $100,000 in 1965, you would need around $750 ,000 now. This means that on an inflation adjusted basis, your investment sold for only 1/3 of what it was worth in 1965, even though you are being taxed on a $150,000 gain. One justification for the lower tax rate on long-term capital gains is this loss of purchasing power. Hillary's proposal is a more appropriate way to deal with this than a simple one step reduction to 20% after one year. However, if one were truly interested in addressing this problem, you would eliminate the lower tax rates on capital gains and index tax basis for inflation each year.

Complexity

By creating all of these additional capital gains tax rates that apply to a small number of taxpayers, possibly on only part of their capital gains, you are introducing additional complexity into the tax code. But that complexity would not be too difficult to handle. Presumably capital losses on holding periods shorter than six years would be applied to similar holding period capital gains and any net capital losses from one holding period bucket would be applied to the highest tax rates of other capital gains until exhausted. This could result in capital loss carryforwards for an additional four holding periods. However it may be that all of the higher rate capital losses will be put in the same bucket since it is not known whether the taxpayer will have gains in subsequent years on income in excess of the thresholds. Keeping track of the carryforwards for each of the holding periods could subject all taxpayers to this additional complexity if there are six loss carryforward buckets, even though the taxpayer may never be in the 1/2 of 1% of taxpayers who would be subject to this tax.

Conventional wisdom says American businesses are myopic, focused only on making their companies look good next quarter in order to temporarily get their stock prices up. The thinking is that this is endemic in corporate culture and is at the root of the sluggish economic recovery and the wide gap between the haves and have nots.

In a speech today, Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton dubbed this “quarterly capitalism.” Clinton proposed a few policy changes aimed at reforming this dysfunctional culture. Most notable was to change the way capital gains are taxed — the taxes paid on the gains enjoyed by investors in stocks and other assets.

The premise for her proposals is off-base: America’s businesses aren’t short-term focused, at least not to the degree that it impedes long-term economic growth.

If they were, then what explains the fact that businesses are investing so much in research and development? According to the Bureau of Economic Analysis, R&D investment is expanding at a robust double-digit pace — and has never been greater relative to the size of the economy. These investments are as risky as they get, and if they payoff it is generally long into the future.

Some argue that short-termism is evident in businesses’ big dividend payouts and stock repurchases. Getting this cash makes investors happy, but at the cost of limiting business expansion and job creation, they claim.

Not so. Businesses are making so much money they have plenty to do all of the above. Indeed, companies are devoting about the same share of their profits to dividends and repurchases as they always have. And job growth is about as strong as it ever gets, with jobs being created across all pay scales.

Wage gains have been tepid, but this still reflects the fallout from the Great Recession, when unemployment topped out in the double-digits. Unemployment and underemployment will be back to normal by this time next year if the current pace of job growth is sustained. Wage growth will accelerate.

Even if you don’t buy into the view that our economy is plagued by quarterly capitalism, it is still good policy to incent businesses to invest more in their people and their own long-term growth. However, tinkering with tax rates on capital gains won’t go far toward achieving that goal.

The shares of most American companies are held by large institutional investors, such as mutual funds, ETFs, pension and hedge funds. These investors are motivated by many things when buying and selling stocks. Whether the cap gains rate is a bit lower if they hold onto their stocks longer isn’t one of them.

Moreover, activist investors who are interested in making a quick buck when they purchase a company’s stock aren’t likely to be dissuaded by such a tax change. Companies that are the targets of activists often do temporarily pull back on expansion plans in an effort to get their stock price up and ward off the activists. Yet this may ultimately force target companies to take the difficult steps needed to be more competitive, and to also create opportunities for competing companies that then enjoy even stronger growth.

Setting aside schemes to incentivize holding stock for a long period of time, broadly increasing capital gains taxes would help ameliorate the skewed wealth distribution. Most capital gains go to the very rich.

Taxing carried interest as normal income and not as a capital gain, also supported by Clinton, is a good idea. Private equity firms and hedge funds that earn carried interest when making investment decisions on behalf of their generally wealthy investors have abused this tax loophole.

But this should be done in the context of broader reforms to our corporate tax code. There is general agreement that our corporations pay too high a tax rate to be globally competitive. President Obama and Congressional Republicans have both put forward plans to reduce corporate tax rates and scale back loopholes.

Hillary Clinton has misdiagnosed what ails the U.S. economy. It isn't short-sighted American companies. It is a broken tax code.

Louisiana theater gunman described as a 'drifter' with mental illness history // WaPo // Ashley Cusick, Sarah Kaplan, J. Freedom du Lac - July 24, 2015

Police on Friday identified an out-of-state "drifter" with a history of mental illness as the lone gunman who killed two people and injured nine others in a crowded movie theater here before turning the gun on himself.

But authorities were struggling to determine why John Russell Houser, 59, of Phenix City, Ala., set off on the rampage late Thursday, and what he was doing in Lafayette, a southwestern Louisiana city about 500 miles from his home.

"Why did he come here? Why did he do that?" Col. Michael D. Edmonson, superintendent of the Louisiana State Police, said at a news conference. "We don't know that," Edmonson said. "We may not find a motive."

Police said Houser was one of 25 people who bought tickets to an evening screening of the romantic comedy "Trainwreck" in Grand Theatre, a multiplex in a busy part of town. Houser watched the first part of the movie, they said, then suddenly stood and silently opened fire with a .40-caliber semiautomatic handgun, targeting the two people sitting directly in front of him first.

He fired at least 13 times, police said, reloading once.

Two women were killed. College student Mayci Breaux, 21, died in the theater, where she had been watching the movie with her boyfriend. Musician and graphic designer Jillian Johnson, 33, died later at a local hospital.

Nine others suffered injuries ranging from minor to life-threatening and were transported to local hospitals, said Lafayette Police Chief Jim Craft. By late Friday, four of the victims had been released.

"Here's a guy who was a drifter . . . who just happened to be in this theater and took two beautiful lives," Edmonson said.

Craft said police received reports of the shooting around 7:30 p.m. Within minutes, two officers who had already been patrolling the crowded multiplex entered the theater.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“As they made their way into the crowd, they heard a shot, and upon entering the theater, the suspect was found deceased from a self-inflicted gunshot wound,” Craft said.

Houser’s car — a blue 1995 Lincoln Continental — was positioned near a theater exit, Craft said. He attempted to leave the multiplex after the shooting. Houser retreated back into the theater, fired three additional shots, striking at least one person, and then turned the gun on himself.

“It was apparent that he was intent on shooting and then escaping,” Craft said.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R) on Friday ordered flags at state buildings to be flown at half-staff out of respect for the victims. A contender for the 2016 GOP presidential nomination, Jindal was fresh off a campaign swing through Iowa when he got word of the shooting and sped to Lafayette.

At a news conference late Thursday, Jindal said there was “no good reason why this act of evil should intrude on the lives of families.” He added: “This is an awful night for Lafayette, this is an awful night for Louisiana, this is an awful night for the United States.”

Jindal also told stories of acts of heroism in the theater. He told of two teachers, longtime friends, one of whom leapt on top of the other to protect her from the bullets. Both were wounded, but the second woman said her friend had probably saved her life.

The second teacher then dragged herself to a fire alarm and pulled it, probably saving many others.

“A lot of folks in that situation would just be thinking about themselves,” Jindal said. “She had the presence of mind to think, all right, even though she was shot in the leg, she saved other people.”

The shooting follows a spate of recent mass shootings and comes three years after another deadly rampage in a movie theater in Aurora, Colo. Monday was the third anniversary of that attack, and jurors are now weighing a death sentence for James Holmes, the gunman found guilty of killing 12 people during a midnight screening of “The Dark Knight Rises” in 2012.

The guilty verdict in Holmes’s case was delivered July 16, the same day a lone gunman opened fire at two military facilities in Chattanooga, Tenn., leaving four Marines and one sailor dead.

Before the Lafayette shooting, President Obama said in an interview with the BBC that gun safety is “the one area where I feel that I’ve been most frustrated and most stymied.”

“The United States of America is the one advanced nation on Earth in which we do not have sufficient common-sense gun-safety laws,” the president said. “Even in the face of repeated mass killings.”

On Friday, Jindal declined to discuss the role gun laws may have played in the tragedy. “This is a time for healing,” he told CNN. “There will be a time for those debates.”

But anti-gun activists quickly seized the moment.

“Two innocent people are dead, several more are injured and hundreds were terrorized all while taking part in one of our country’s most beloved pastimes — a night at the movies,” Dan Gross, president of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, said in a statement.

“Investigators have already made it clear that the shooter has a criminal history. As we await further details from the investigation, it will be important to learn whether he legally had any business owning a firearm and, if not, finding out how he got one.”

Authorities said Houser purchased the handgun legally from a Phenix City pawn shop in February 2014.

But much else about Houser remained murky late Friday. He had been staying at a local motel, where law enforcement agents found wigs, glasses and disguises during a predawn search. Additionally, he had illegally switched the license plate on his Lincoln Continental, Craft said.

Craft told CNN that Houser “was maybe trying to disguise his appearance, although we’re told that when he purchased his ticket, he was not wearing any type of disguise.”

It remained unclear why Houser went to the multiplex, why he chose the raunchy Amy Schumer comedy and why he started shooting.

“Why this city? Why this movie? Why those people?” Craft said.

The Grand Theatre 16 is one of two Grand multiplexes in Lafayette. The other was quickly shut down after the shooting “out of an abundance of caution,” Craft said.

About 300 people were at the theater at the time of the shooting, including Jalen Fernell, a 20-year-old student at the University of Louisiana at Lafayette.

Fernell was in a different theater watching a screening of “Southpaw” when the sound of gunshots interrupted the movie’s opening scene. Fernell said he initially thought the noise was part of the movie but then heard the fire alarm.

“When those sirens went off, immediately my heart sank into my chest because I was like, ‘Wait, those gunshots came from inside the building,’ ” Fernell said.

The audience “rampaged” out of the theater, Fernell said, emerging to the sound of sirens and the sight of police and emergency vehicles swarming the parking lot. Police were shouting directions over a public address system, and Fernell said the scene was frenzied.

A woman sitting on the curb was bleeding from the leg. A police radio crackled: “Six down in Theater 14.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Moments later, a horde of officers charged into the multiplex. Over the radio, Fernell heard the words “suspect down.”

“I was terrified, because I didn’t know what was going to happen next,” he said. “My main thing was I was trying not to get shot because we didn’t know what was going on. Everybody was running around; everybody was screaming. It was a stressful state.”

Fernell added: “That’s the last thing that you’d think would happen at a movie theater, especially on a Thursday night.”

Police said people left dozens of belongings behind as they ran — shoes, bags, cellphones and keys. The parking lot, filled early Friday with flickering blue light from police vehicles, was packed with abandoned cars.

Police said they have no reason to think that Houser targeted any other locations or that there might be another active shooter. Investigators don’t think Houser knew any of his victims.

“It does not look like he went there to target somebody specifically,” Jindal said on CNN.

In a statement from Air Force One while en route to Kenya, White House press secretary Josh Earnest said the president had been briefed on the shootings and the status of those injured.

“The thoughts and prayers of everyone at the White House, including the president and first lady, are with the community of Lafayette, Louisiana, especially the families of those who were killed,” the statement said.

Meanwhile, Lafayette City Councilman Keith Patin gave a tearful interview to CNN.

“It’s so terrible; it’s devastating,” Patin said. “We’re used to dealing with natural types of catastrophes, hurricanes, stuff like that. But nothing like this.”

Texas Supreme Court Orders Houston LGBT Ordinance To Be Repealed Or Put On Ballot // BuzzFeed // Chris Geidner - July 24, 2015

The Texas Supreme Court on Friday ordered the Houston City Council to repeal an LGBT nondiscrimination ordinance it passed in 2014 or put a referendum opponents had sought on this November’s ballot.

In the Friday decision, the court gave Houston officials a month to decide what to do, ordering a decision be made by Aug. 24.

After the “HERO” LGBT nondiscrimination ordinance was passed by Houston City Council, a group sought a referendum effort. If enough signatures were gathered, as certified by the city secretary, then City Council would have the option to repeal the ordinance or put it on the ballot.

After a review of the signatures submitted, the city secretary asserted that sufficient signatures were gathered but also noted that the city attorney found that many pages of the petitions were invalid — meaning that any signatures on those pages would be invalid. Accordingly, Houston City Council found that there were insufficient valid signatures to force reconsideration of the ordinance or a vote.

Opponents of the law sued to get City Council to accept the petitions, lost at the trial court, and appealed. The opponents also, separately, had asked the Texas Supreme Court to issue a writ of mandamus — a request that a court order a public official to take a specified action, here, repealing the ordinance or putting it on the ballot.

The Texas Supreme Court on Friday held that it would not wait on the appeal of the trial court decision before considering the issue because "the appellate process will not resolve the case in time for the referendum to be placed on the November 2015 ballot."

Then, with no oral arguments having been held in the case, the Texas Supreme Court found that the city secretary's statements served as certification that sufficient valid signatures were gathered — the city attorney's findings notwithstanding. As such, the court ruled in an unsigned opinion, City Council could not reject the petitions and had to do one of two things: repeal the ordinance or put it on the ballot.

"Once the City Council received the City Secretary's certification, it had a ministerial duty to act," the court stated. "If the City Council does not repeal the ordinance by August 24, 2015, then by that date the City Council must order that the ordinance be put to popular vote during the November 2015 election."

The court also put enforcement of the ordinance on hold in the meantime.

U.S. Preparing to Release Convicted Israeli Spy Jonathan Pollard, Officials Say // WSJ // Devlin Barrett - July 24, 2015

The Obama administration is preparing to release convicted Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard, according to U.S. officials, some of whom hope the move will smooth relations with Israel in the wake of the Iran nuclear deal.

Such a move would end a decadeslong fight over Mr. Pollard, who was arrested on charges of spying for Israel in 1985 and later sentenced to life in prison. The case has long been a source of tension between the U.S. and Israel, which has argued that a life sentence for spying on behalf of a close U.S. partner is too harsh. For decades, Israel has sought Mr. Pollard's early release only to be rejected by the U.S.

Now, some U.S. officials are pushing for Mr. Pollard's release in a matter of weeks. Others expect it could take months, possibly until his parole consideration date in November. Some U.S. officials strongly denied Friday there was any link between the Iran deal and Mr. Pollard's prospective release, saying that any release decision would be made by the U.S. Parole Commission.

A White House spokesman referred questions to the Justice Department, where a spokesman declined to comment on a matter which may be before the Parole Commission.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has been a vocal opponent of the deal struck between Iran and six world powers to curb Iran's nuclear program. Discord between Israel and the U.S., longtime allies, has led to a deteriorating relationship that is the stormiest it has been in decades.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Netanyahu has personally pressed for years to get the U.S. to release Mr. Pollard, who is currently serving time in a federal prison in Butner, N.C.

Mr. Pollard, 60 years old, was a civilian analyst with the U.S. Navy when he was arrested for passing secret documents to Israel. He eventually pleaded guilty and was sentenced to life.

The mechanism or likely rationale for freeing Mr. Pollard couldn't immediately be learned. The most likely scenario would be to free him when he first becomes eligible for parole in November, according to some U.S. officials.

Under sentencing laws at the time he was convicted, Mr. Pollard has to be considered for parole after 30 years. The Bureau of Prisons website currently lists his possible release date as Nov. 21, which is the date the federal parole commission is slated to consider whether to end his sentence.

A parole hearing for Mr. Pollard was held in early July. Mr. Pollard's lawyer, Eliot Lauer, said he hasn't heard from the parole commission "and I would expect that either I or my client would be the ones who would be notified."

Last year, President Barack Obama told an Israeli interviewer: "I have no plans for releasing Jonathan Pollard immediately but what I am going to be doing is to make sure that he, like every other American who's been sentenced, is accorded the same kinds of review and the same examination of the equities that any other individual would provide."

To get out before November would require unusual intervention. In the federal prison system, often the easiest way to free an inmate early is to cite deteriorating health. Mr. Pollard's supporters say he is suffering from a host of medical ailments that should qualify him for mercy.

The U.S. has considered releasing him before but always backed away from such a move, largely because of opposition from senior leaders at the Central Intelligence Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Justice Department.

It is possible such opposition could again scuttle any release, but it appears his chances at winning freedom are better now than they have ever been, U.S. officials said. Some U.S. officials have concluded he will be a free man before the year is over, these people said.

The prospect of Mr. Pollard's freedom still grates on many U.S. intelligence officials, in part because his release wouldn't likely come as part of like-for-like swap, as is often how espionage cases are resolved. Other officials counter that 30 years is a fair punishment and that keeping Mr. Pollard in prison until he dies would serve little purpose.

Mr. Pollard has explained his espionage activity by citing a great affinity for Israel, though counter-intelligence officials say he was paid tens of thousands of dollars for his work.

From June 1984 through November 1985, Mr. Pollard removed large amounts of highly classified U.S. intelligence from his office, made copies and delivered it to Israeli operatives.

About a year after his spying began, federal agents stopped Mr. Pollard as he was leaving work and questioned him about the possible unauthorized removal of classified information.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During that conversation, he twice took breaks to call his wife, using a prearranged code word “cactus,” signaling that she should remove a suitcase full of classified information from their apartment. She also pleaded guilty and served three years in prison and later moved to Israel.

Top CIA Official Says Nuke Deal Makes It Hard for Iran to Cheat // WSJ // Damian Paletta - July 24, 2015

A top Central Intelligence Agency official said Friday that the recently brokered nuclear agreement between leading nations and Iran will make it difficult for the Middle Eastern country to dupe nuclear inspectors.

CIA deputy director David Cohen, speaking at the Aspen Security Forum, said intelligence officers were “reasonably” confident that the terms of the nuclear deal would prevent Iran from cheating in a way that avoided international detection.

“We would be able to detect Iran if it were trying to deviate from the requirements that they’ve signed up to,” Mr. Cohen said.

He cited inspectors’ “real-time persistent access to declared sites as well as a mechanism for getting scheduled access to suspicious sites” as a primary reason that it would be difficult for Iran to improperly enrich uranium while the terms of the deal were in place. He also referenced the U.S. government’s access to “other information and capabilities,” as a way to ensure Iran’s cooperation, though he didn’t provide more information.

Mr. Cohen’s comments were the first public statements by a CIA official since Iran, the U.S., and five other countries reached the nuclear agreement earlier this month.

By signing up, you agree to our terms.

Thank you. I am delighted to be here. You are part of a great story - the revival of a city that means so much to all Americans. In these past few years, when confronted with grave challenges, you have seized the opportunity to reform the city you love.

And you have begun to repair the damage done by decades of mismanagement and empty promises.

I want to congratulate Governor Rick Snyder for his leadership. I want to acknowledge Secretary of State Ruth Johnson, and Attorney General Bill Schuette. And Mayor Mike Duggan for his determination to serve the city of his birth.

I want to recognize as well the hard work of Kevyn Orr, who I am proud to say is a son of Florida.

And finally, I want to recognize all those who were involved in making difficult and often painful decisions. Your work is not complete. But your efforts have captured the attention of our nation. Because across the U.S., we are asking ourselves the same questions:

How do we recapture the prosperity and opportunity that once defined cities like Detroit?

How do we restore America's faith in the moral promise of our great nation that any child born today can reach further than their parents?

This is an urgent issue: Far too many Americans live on the edge of economic ruin.And many more feel like they're struck in place, working longer and harder, even as they're losing ground.

Tens of millions of Americans no longer see a clear path to rise above their challenges. Something is holding them back. Not a lack of ambition. Not a lack of hope. Not because they are lazy or see themselves as victims.

Something else. Something is an artificial weight on their shoulders.

Today and in the coming weeks, I will address this critical issue.

And I will offer a new vision. A plan of action that is different than what we have been hearing in Washington D.C. It is a vision rooted in conservative principles and tethered to our shared belief in opportunity and the unknown possibilities of a nation given the freedom to act, to create, to dream and to rise.

We see that belief every day in action.

In oil and gas fields once given up for dry we are now assuring America's energy security. In hospitals, we are extending life and beating back once untreatable diseases. In charter schools, we are connecting students to their potential. In labs and hacker spaces, invention comes from every corner of society and the world still comes to America to learn how to create and innovate.

People know this country can be more than it is today. And that each one of us can, and must, be a part of it.

But they know this as well: We have a lot of work to do.

Today, Americans across the country are frustrated. They see only a small portion of the population riding the economy's up escalator... It's true enough that we've seen some recent and welcome good news on the economy.

But it's very little, and it's come very late.

Six years after the recession ended, median incomes are down, households are, on average, poorer ... and millions of people have given up looking for a job altogether. Roughly two out of three American households live paycheck to paycheck. Any unexpected expense can push them into financial ruin. We have a record number of Americans on food stamps and living in poverty.

The recovery has been everywhere but in the family paychecks. The American Dream has become a mirage for far too many. So the central question we face here in Detroit and across America is this: Can we restore that dream -- that moral promise -- that each generation can do better?

If we can't answer that question, no tax, no new welfare program, will save our system or our way of life. Because America's moral promise isn't broken when someone is wealthy. It's broken when achieving success is far beyond our imagination.

America is a place where, as Lincoln dreamed, any person may look forward and hope to be a hired laborer this year...and the next, work for himself... and finally, to hire men to work for him!

America, though discouraged, has not given up on the dream of Lincoln.

The dream of Lincoln is alive at 5 a.m. at a bus depot in a distant suburb or in an inner city as workers get to jobs in hotels and restaurants and hospitals. The dream is alive in the breath of a construction worker running cable under a city street in the bitter night air.

The dream is alive in the college student driving an Uber car part-time to graduate debt-free.

Lincoln's dream is alive every day nand at every moment when people choose to buy a home, start a business, enroll in school, save for the future. They know such commitments aren't easy and don't pay off right away. But they're worth doing. If Americans are working harder than ever earning less than they once did, our government and our leaders should step up, offer a plan, fix what's wrong - or they should step aside.

Let's ask how we got to this point. Let's start in Detroit.

Because in a sense, the troubles Detroit faces are an echo of the troubles facing Washington, D.C.

Decades of big government policies, petty politics, impossible-to-meet pension promises, chronic mismanagement and broken services — combined with a massive loss of jobs and competitiveness in the auto industry — drove tens of thousands of people from this city and this region.

For example: Detroit under the previous administration was so proud of shutting down businesses that hadn't paid their licenses and fees, they bragged about it in press releases. The city threatened nearly 900 businesses with closure and followed through on nearly 400 businesses, shutting them down.

Many of these were small businesses run out of homes and alley-facing garages, run by people who just wanted to take that first step up the economic ladder.

One of those business owners, Derek Little, had a simple way to describe his frustration: I'm running a legit business... They could be doing something better.

And while the city was shutting down people who were trying to build a business ...it couldn't even do its job correctly: The city was losing money writing parking tickets.

Of course, on Amtrak they lose money on the snack car. They literally have a captive audience.

But government inefficiency isn't just irritating. It's instructive. If the government can't collect parking fines, or sell snacks on a train, why would government know how to enable every citizen to move up in life?

That's why I launched the Right to Rise PAC. So that someone would speak for people who don't want to wait for the government to deliver prosperity. They want to earn it themselves. Government isn't the only issue here. There is far more at work. But in a sense, fixing government policy is the easiest problem to solve. And it's the one most responsive to the demands of voters.

So, I am getting involved in politics again, because that's where the work has to begin. The opportunity gap is the defining issue of our time.

More Americans are stuck at their income levels than ever before. It's very hard for people to go from the bottom rungs of the economy to the top. Or even to the middle.

This should alarm you. It alarmed me. The problem starts when we fear the one thing that can help unlock the economic status quo: The freedom to compete and work as a team to build great things.

Competition is messy. But it's essential. We've all seen the battles: The taxicab companies fight against web-enabled car services. The restaurants fight against the food trucks. The brick-and-mortar retailers fight against the Internet companies.

I'm not here to take sides. And I don't think government should either. Because when government protects one business against another, or tilts the field of competition, there is a clear loser: Anyone who wants to create something as a team. Anyone who wants to innovate and shake things up. Anyone who wants more choices and better service. And we know that in the end, standing against competition and dynamism is a losing battle.

In 1955, 60 years ago, the Fortune 500 list first appeared. Of the companies on that list, fully 88% don't even exist today or have fallen away. Today's Fortune 500 will be replaced by new companies that are just starting today.

This is hard for some people to accept. Because entrenched interests do not like giving up what they have. That's why they fear small competitors who have nothing to lose. You know the stories: The president of Michigan Savings Bank imparted some wisdom to the young lawyer for a small start-up company: The horse, the bank president said,'is here to stay, but the automobile is only a fad.'

The small start-up that lawyer represented... was the Ford Motor Company.We can laugh about it now because Ford and the other innovators of Detroit had the economic freedom to compete and to prove the doubters wrong.

Our nation has always valued such economic freedom because in economic freedom, each citizen has the power to propel themselves forward and upward.

This really isn't understood in Washington D.C. And you can see why: It's a company town.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And the company is government. It's all they know.

For several years now, they have been recklessly degrading the value of work, the incentive to work, and the rewards of work.

We have seen them cut the definition of a full-time job from 40 to 30 hours, slashing the ability of paycheck earners to make ends meet. We have seen them create welfare programs and tax rules that punish people with lost benefits and higher taxes for moving up those first few rungs of the economic ladder.

Instead of a safety net to cushion our occasional falls, they have built a spider web that traps people in perpetual dependence. We have seen them waive the rules that helped so many people escape welfare.

The progressive and liberal mindset believes that to every problem there is a Washington D.C. solution. But that instinct doesn't solve any problem, other than the problem of how to keep Washington's regional economy well-lubricated.

And the cost is enormous!

Let's say you're a hard-working middle-class family. You work hard. You pay your mortgage on time. As President Obama likes to say: You play by the rules.

But for President Obama, one of the rules is this: He reserves the right to change the rules.

Just last month, he thought it was a good idea to tax 529 college savings plans. Remember: 529s were created to be tax-free ways to save for college. Millions of people started them for their kids and grandkids. So it's no surprise people hated the president's idea. And he dropped it. But it was an instructive lesson in the liberal and progressive mindset. Saving for college is the responsible thing to do. But instead of embracing 529s, the liberals moved to tax them.

It's frustrating. But it shows you how they think.

And if you want to know how they act, ask Sharon DeLay. Sharon founded a recruiting company in Westerville, Ohio. Here's what she said: It's as if the politicians and regulators in Washington want me to fail - and spend all their time thinking up new ways to ensure that I do ...You either want me to be the engine of the economy or you don't!

Here's a message for Sharon and millions like her: There's a better way.Let'sine this path first by the core principles of a Right to Rise society because once we do that, the policies, the laws and the way forward will be much clearer.

Let's start with the first principle: When it comes to ensuring opportunity and a chance at success, the most important factor isn't government. It's a committed family.

Social scientists across the ideological spectrum agree on this: If you want to predict whether someone will graduate from school, go to college and move forward in life, just find out one thing: Were they raised in a loving household by two parents? If you didn't, you can overcome it, but it's very hard. If you did, you have a built-in advantage in life.

The evidence is overwhelming. Every child has a greater chance at opportunity when they are raised by loving, caring and supportive parents and a committed family. That isn't the work of government. But it's critical that governmental leaders recognize that and support it.

A second principle: Growth above all. A growing economy, whether here in Detroit or throughout this country is the difference between poverty and prosperity for millions. If you want to close the opportunity gap, grow the economy. This is a principle that concentrates the mind.

If a law or a rule doesn't contribute to growth, why do it? If a law subtracts from growth, why are we discussing it? And for what it's worth, I don't think the US should settle for anything less than 4% growth a year — which is about twice our current average. At that rate, the middle class will thrive again.

And in the coming months, I intend to detail how we can get there, with a mix of smart policies and reforms to tap our resources and capacity to innovate, whether in energy, manufacturing, health care or technology.

Third: The right to rise depends on a government that makes it easier to work than not work.

That means fewer laws restricting the labor market and reducing the penalties that come with moving up from the lowest rungs of the ladder.

Fourth: To address the income gap, let's close the opportunity gap, and that starts with doing everything we can to give every child, from every neighborhood, a great education. This won't happen overnight — trust me, I know. But I also know it works. And it takes every tool we have.

Accountability for teachers and school administrators, assessment of student learning, high standards, and choices. These key elements of school reform work and we have the results to prove it.

Finally, let's embrace reform everywhere, especially in our government. Let's start with the simple principle of who holds the power. I say give Washington less and give states and local governments more.

We make multi-billion dollar infrastructure decisions based on a labor law written in 1921. President Obama proposes making rules on the Internet using laws written in the 1930s. We regulate global airlines using laws written for railroads. Our immigration laws were written a half-century ago.

Governmental policy seems frozen, incapable and fearful of change. It is in the way. And we deserve better than this.

If we don't transform ourselves to meet new challenges and seize new opportunities, we know what happens next. Look around this city. In its history there is a warning to all of us.

A century ago, Detroit was America's great innovation hub. The Silicon Valley of its age.

It was bigger than Chicago. It was the nation's wealthiest city in 1960.

Detroit put the world on wheels and created the jobs that lifted millions of Americans into the middle class.

This city was the arsenal of Democracy and delivered the arms needed to defend freedom across two oceans.

Detroit promised prosperity and it delivered.

Sons of sharecroppers coming up from the South, farmhands from the Upper Midwest, immigrants who spoke Polish, Yiddish, Greek and Arabic.

Their children settled. They prospered. And some of their grandchildren are in this room today.

And now, you are rebuilding this city. I know you will be that great city again. Because Americans by nature work and strive to succeed.

It is already happening.

In the Madison Building, not far from here, new companies are rising. One of them, iRule, is led by two young men, one born in Russia, the other in Israel. They left secure jobs as automotive engineers to start their business in 2009. At the very bottom of the recession. Here's what one of them, Itai ben Gal said: 'We know Detroit has its baggage, but we believe we're part of the solution.'

Three years later, they have 21 employees, including Itai's father, who is the CFO.

And this activity is happening downtown, in an area once ignored.

Another Detroit entrepreneur grew up in the suburbs. He rarely came downtown as a child. But today, he works here. He lives here. This is what he said: 'We see the city for what it can be... not for what it was.'

That's how we should see everything. Not just Detroit.But in all of America.

I know some in the media think conservatives don't care about the cities.

But they are wrong. We believe that every American and in every community has a right to pursue happiness. They have a right to rise.

So I say: Let's go where our ideas can matter most. Where the failures of liberal government are most obvious. Let's deliver real conservative success.

And you know what will happen?

We'll create a whole lot of new conservatives.

I know, because I've lived it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I come from Miami, another city that faced the same struggles as Detroit.

In my city, the schools were failing, opportunity was scarce and for too many, simply being born in the wrong neighborhood meant the American Dream was cruelly out of reach.

I joined with my friend, Willard Fair, a courageous leader in the civil rights movement.

We decided that the right to rise, was also a civil right. So we went to work to change education in Florida.

While there's much more to do, we saw lives changed and hope restored.

You can do it, here in Detroit. We can do it, across America.

Because this morning, 320 million Americans got up ... and they are on 320 million different paths of life.

It's our goal to see them succeed.

And it's our responsibility to do everything possible to help them.

Because by their success, they will not only build prosperity for themselves. They will renew the promise of this nation when everyone, has the right to rise.

Those are the stakes. That's why we're here. Please join me in this great cause.

Thank you and may God bless you, and may God bless America.

The 2014 Russian War against Ukraine

In the past few weeks, what was painfully obvious from the very beginning to Ukrainians [that the terrorist conflict in Eastern Ukraine was artificially manufactured, clandestinely funded, militarily supplied with weapons and fighting personnel, and secretly orchestrated by the Kremlin] is now grudgingly acknowledged by the rest of the world. Russia has now openly invaded Ukraine and only Putin's generously paid Western apologists or the extremely naïve could argue otherwise. The Russian government's continuing boldfaced lies that the alleged Donbas "separatists" are self-reliant disgruntled Ukrainians who are Russian speakers seeking only to protect their rights can no longer be credulously accepted by the West. This ruse has run its course. Russia is and has for months been in a state of war against Ukraine -- its sole objective is to eradicate Ukraine's independence, and return it to a vassal state under the dictatorship of Moscow thus giving a rebirth to a new USSR-like empire.

Since the cataclysmic events of World War II, the world's nations have attempted to establish basic principles of international law and behavior to be adhered to by the governments of all nations so as to prevent future conflagrations on a global scale. The UN Charter, the Helsinki Final Act [the charter document of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe] and the various organic documents of the European Union, have had as their linchpin the principle of territorial integrity and security and the inviolability of borders of independent states. NATO was created in part to protect the territorial integrity of its member states from outside military threats. Since 1994, when it entered NATO's Partnership for Peace Program, Ukraine has participated in NATO outreach programs and took part in NATO-led missions around the world and alongside American troops in such places as Iraq and Afghanistan. It was this principle - territorial integrity and sovereignty of independent states - that was solemnly invoked - jointly and severally - by the United Kingdom, the Russia Federation and the United States in the Budapest Memorandum of 1994 which fervently pledged assurances by these countries of the inviolability of Ukrainian borders, an on which assurances Ukraine relied and voluntarily relinquished 1600 nuclear warheads - the then third largest nuclear arsenal on the globe.

It is now self evident that the Kremlin has not and will not adhere to any of its internationally made pledges regarding the territorial integrity and sovereignty of states thus undermining the bedrock upon which European peace is built in the aftermath of World War II. Rather, Russia has intentionally trampled upon Ukraine's political and economic sovereignty and its territorial integrity for quite some time in full view of the world. Regrettably, the response from the United States and the European Union has been a blinders-like muted scolding of Putin with tempered economic sanctions but specifically excluding any military assistance to Ukraine. This piecemeal approach has only emboldened Putin and has given him a strategic time-advantage to fully implement his invasion of Ukraine, which in turn, will directly affect the economic and political stability of the member states of the EU. In recent days, and to the world's astonishment, Putin has brandished not so veiled bellicose threats emphasizing the nuclear armament power that he has at his disposal. Clearly, it is in the long range self-interest of the West to take meaningful steps to stop and reverse Russia's aggression against Ukraine and thus protect its own political and territorial integrity from future jeopardy.

Towards this end, the United States and the United Kingdom have a particular responsibility under the Budapest Memorandum. There are those apologists that argue that the Budapest Memorandum is not a "treaty" [even though it was part of Ukraine's accession to the Non-Proliferation Treaty] and, according to their flawed logic, its breach is not enforceable nor has any consequential obligations for its other signatories. However, The Budapest Memorandum is clearly a contractual agreement under which three countries [Russia, the US and UK] together obtained a valuable and tangible concession from Ukraine for their joint benefit - i.e. the relinquishment of 1600 nuclear warheads - in consideration for which these three countries [Russia, the US and UK] together gave their joint assurances for the territorial integrity and economic independence of Ukraine. As such, since one of the beneficiaries of the Budapest Memorandum [Russia] egregiously breached its promise to respect Ukraine's territorial integrity, it is the obligation of the other two beneficiary signatories of the Budapest Memorandum [the US and UK] to make certain that Ukrainian territorial integrity is fully restored. Failure to do so will undoubtedly completely undercut any future negotiations with other nuclear powers in the hope of achieving nuclear disarmament and world peace.

The time has now come for the West to take strong and meaningful action in support of Ukraine's independence and territorial integrity. The West must stop moving the goal line in order to placate Putin in the unlikely Pollyanna-like expectation that he will take an "off-ramp" and deescalate the situation in Ukraine. The hard and uncontroverted evidence proves exactly the contrary - Putin only interprets such peace intended initiatives as a sign of weakness. He only respects decisiveness and power. Therefore, the West must face him with resolve and strength.

It is crystal clear that neither the United States nor the EU will put boots on the ground in Ukraine. However, as Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko has expressed to world leaders, - Ukrainians have the resolve and will to defend their homeland – what Ukrainians need are military supplies and weaponry to aid them in their battle for national survival. Therefore, we strongly urge that the following steps be implemented immediately by the United States government, NATO, and its European allies.

Military assistance in the form of lethal weapons and nonlethal military supplies, as well as advisors and related intelligence and equipment.

The imposition of full sector sanctions, especially in the banking and fossil fuel industries, and the bank accounts of Russian governmental business entities frozen.

Ukraine's accession to non-NATO ally status by the United States should be expeditiously granted.

Increased humanitarian medical and other assistance by the international community for persons injured in the war and for the displaced persons from Eastern Ukraine and Crimea should be accelerated.

All sales of military or dual use equipment should be immediately stopped - especially by France which is planning in the near future to transfer two Mistral type helicopter attack carriers to Russia.

Additional monetary funding for the Ukrainian government in the form of guaranteed loans should be provided to help Ukraine weather the economic crisis caused by the Russian invasion.

The United States and Europe are at a historically crucial crossroad. America must take strong and decisive action and reaffirm its world leadership position now! If Western governments continue on the existing path of placating Putin and "doing business as usual", then they will condemn our children and grandchildren to a probable conflagration on the European continent that will be as great or even greater than the horrors of World War II [recall Putin's recent verbal flexing of his nuclear muscle] .....and from which America will have no escape.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 09/17/08

Main Topics: Wall Street, AIG Bailout, McCain on Good Morning America

Summary of Shift:

Campaign coverage continues to focus on the Wall Street crisis and the two candidates economic plans. Opposition to this morning's bailout of AIG caused McCain's recent flip-flop on government regulations to receive much attention. Carly Fiorina's gaffe on McCain and Palin not being able to run a major corporation was also a hot topic as well as Holtz-Eakin's statement that McCain created the Blackberry.

In other news, all eyes are on Wall Street as American's fear for their investments, pensions and jobs. The US Embassy in Yemen was attacked by a car bomb; many Yemen workers were killed or injured, no reported injuries to Americans. Hurricane Ike's death toll rises as the debris is cleared and the damage is assessed. The hurricane also caused an estimated $16 billion dollars in damage to property and infrastructure.

1. CNN - ALINA CHO: Yesterday, Senator John McCain said he opposed government financial oversight, now the truth is, until recently the GOP presidential candidate consistently called himself an opponent of most government regulation. In fact, in a Wall Street Journal article about six months ago, McCain said he's always for less regulation. But, that he also understands the opposing view. McCain went on to say, "I am fundamentally a deregulator." Fast forward to now, with the recent problems on Wall Street, McCain is talking more frequently of increasing government regulation on the financial sector. […] McCain went on to say that there needs to be more transparency, more accountability on Wall Street, but so far no specifics on a plan. So is Senator Biden right when he says that Senator McCain has refused to regulate? The verdict, Biden statement is historically accurate. But with all the recent turmoil in the financial markets, McCain's position appears to be changing.

John McCain Interviewed on Good Morning America, Talks Economy, Jobs, and First Actions as President (ABC 09/17/08 7:31am)

ROBIN ROBERTS: You love coming to this part of the country, hard working people. They wake up and they hear the news that the Federal Government is going to bail out insurance giant, AIG, to the tune of $85 billion dollars. Do you agree with that?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, I agree with you, these are hard working Americans. Last night I had dinner with a man who's a teacher, or his wife is a teacher, he's a locksmith. Another family, mother is a nurse, they're the fundamentals of America, they're still strong. But they've been betrayed by the top of our economy. By the greedy Wall Street excesses, sometimes I think may be even corruption. And they have had their lives harmed because of greed and excess. We've got to fix it, we've got to say that it will never happen again, as President I will make sure that it never happens again. Now on the bailout itself, I didn't want to do that, and I don't think anybody I know wanted to do that. But there were literally millions of people who's retirement, whose investments, whose insurance were at risk here, they were going to have their lives destroyed because of the greed, and excess, and corruption. When I say corruption, many of these executives, these Wall Street CEO's, said everything's fine, as you know, up until a short time ago. Everything's fine, not to worry. Meanwhile, Congress, the regulators, paid no attention whatsoever to it. We have an alphabet soup of regulatory agencies, all of them were asleep at the switch. And the Congress, particularly as far as Fannie and Freddie are concerned, went right along with it. And the special interests and the lobbyists took over.

ROBERTS: You talk about Congress, and of course, you've been there in Washington all these many years, and you're saying, a little bit asleep at the switch.

MCCAIN: Two years ago I gave a speech and argued on several occasions, if Fannie and Freddie were in trouble, they were carrying out unsafe, and unsound, and even corrupt practices, and I said that this has got to stop. And I have fought for reform all the time that I've been in Congress. I've taken on my party, I've taken on the other party, I've taken on the President. Senator Obama's never taken on his party on any major issue. This requires a reformer, that's my record, of reform. And we have to fix it, and we will fix it, and it'll never happen again when I'm president of the United States. And we got to grow the economy and create jobs, that's the best way out of this.

ROBERTS: And how do you go about it? Because yesterday, when you were talking about Chris Cuomo, you said that you would perhaps reform a kind of 9/11 commission. In talking to folks here, like you did, they said enough with the commissions, enough with the talk. What are the real solutions, what are the practical solutions, not the talk in getting it done?

MCCAIN: We need to get the best minds in America together. I mean, this is a crisis, this is one of the most severe crisis in modern times. So we got to get the best minds in America together, to say look, not only did this happen but we got to all work together, Republican and Democrat. I mean, this calls for bi-partisanship, this calls for patriotism. This calls for saving the economy of the people here, the Lipshz Family on this farm, they're the heartland of America. So clearly, we have to have transparency, we have to have oversight, we have to combine these regulatory alphabet soup organizations. We have to make them work. They need a chief executive who knows how to crack the whip. And knows how to reform Washington, and reform the way that we do business. And frankly, bring these people to account. Hold these people to account that are responsible for this. And if many of them broke the law, then maybe some of them should be in jail.

ROBERTS: Well, people here, you saying that, and believe in your commitment to wanting to do that. But Senator, they're saying, if you're in office, they want something tangible. When they hear that, they're like, what is the first thing people will fix? What's the first thing you'll change?

MCCAIN: The first thing I'll fix is I'll make sure that they're taxes are not raised, I'll make sure that they'll be available for affordable health insurance. We'll grow jobs, we will get off alternative energy, that frankly this family, who uses a lot of gasoline, we got to get off that dependence on foreign oil. I know how to do that, and I have a concrete plan to fix our economy. And I'll make their health insurance affordable and available, quality education for their kids, and I'll keep taxes low. They don't need a tax increase in this very difficult time. And I will be opposed to that, and I will make sure that it doesn't happen. But we can restore our economy again. But we got to clean up this mess, and drain the swamp that's causing so many problems, and having so many innocent bystanders being harmed by it.

MCCAIN: And I just want to also say, look, America can get through this, our best days are ahead of us, not behind us. They need a government that works for them, not for the special interests in Washington. That is my record.

John and Cindy McCain Interviewed on Good Morning America, Talk Roe v. Wade, Townhall Debates (ABC 09/17/08 7:42)
ROBIN ROBERTS: You're never far from your husband's side. Does he confide with you, does he talk to you about the major issues and get your advice on some things?

CINDY MCCAIN: Well, certainly at the end of the day, the issues are not what we talk about. We're usually checking in with our children and things like that. But certainly we talk, absolutely.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOHN MCCAIN: I think we should have full disclosure there, there's a critique.

CINDY MCCAIN: There's a critique, that's true. I was trying to be nice!

JOHN MCCAIN: Of my performance, and those kind of things.

DIANE SAWYER: How does she think you're doing?

JOHN: I sometimes get mixed reviews, and sometimes I deserve them.

SAWYER: If I could ask about one issue, because we are here in the heartland, we keep hearing about a lot of social issues as we travel around here. And I wanted to clear up something if I could real quick, because Mrs. McCain, CBS reported on Roe v. Wade, that they had contacted your staff, and you had said that you do not, as Mrs. Bush in fact has said she does not, want the repeal of Roe v. Wade, so that some states can outlaw abortion. And yet, Senator McCain, you have indicated in previous interviews that you would like the repeal of Roe v. Wade so that the states can make their decisions. What's the difference in the two of you views on the issue?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, let me just say, this is all about courage and compassion. It's about changing the culture of America. I am pro-life and I support that position, and I know that Cindy does too. And we need to ask young American women who are faced with this terrible decision that we will help them have the courage to bring a baby into this world, and we'll have the compassion and help them in every way that we can address it. And it will be, if Roe v. Wade is overturned, go back to the states and the states will make the decisions about it. So, that's the issue here as to how we treat the issue of human life in America. And it's got to be done with courage and compassion and that's both of our positions.

SAWYER: But Mrs. McCain, do you oppose the repeal of Roe v. Wade, was that report correct?

CINDY MCCAIN: You know there are people who are without jobs, that are hurting, whose businesses have collapsed, who don't know where they're going to find money to feed their families. This is not the major issue on people's minds right now. What concerns me, is when I talk to people, like people today on this farm, people we had dinner with last night. They're having trouble making ends meat. A difference in how we stand on abortion, and things like that, is not what's foremost in the voters minds right now, at all.

JOHN MCCAIN: So, look. This is an issue that we have to change the culture of America, those of us who respect the rights of the unborn, that's the thrust of our effort. And I'm happy to note that we're adoptive parents, and it's enriched our lives. And we hope that that will also encourage others to do the same.

ROBERTS: You talked about that people don't want to get into personal issues, that that doesn't help them, that they want to talk about the issues. But, it has gotten very personal this particular time around, the campaign, on both sides. And a lot of people thought it was refreshing on 9/11 that no negative ads, you and Senator Obama appeared at the National Forum on Community Service, and can we make that kind of commitment, why does it have to, how does it really serve anybody when it becomes so bitter?

JOHN MCCAIN: It doesn't, but I can tell you one way that it makes it a lot better, because I've been in previous campaigns, have Senator Obama come to a townhall meeting with me. Let's go to townhall meetings all over America, both of us, stand before the American people. That's what Barry Goldwater and Jack Kennedy had decided to do. And I've asked time after time. Senator Obama, come to the townhall meetings with me, let the people ask, we respond. I guarantee you that changes the tone of the campaign because then people pay attention to the candidates, not the back and forth, not the surrogates, not the 527s. And so, I ask Senator Obama again. We got 49 days left. 48. Let's go to the townhall meetings, and then the American people will be focused on that. I don't know why he's refused to do that, because when he was first asked he said he would go anywhere anytime. And so I hope that he will take up that request, and I look forward to it, I'll fly with him. I promise not to fly the airplane.

Romney Praises McCain's Economic Experience, Then is Shown a Clip of Him During Primaries Saying Otherwise, Throws Fiorina Under the Bus (CNN 09/17/08 7:32am)

JOHN ROBERTS: With your vast experience in the business world here and in financial markets in particular what's the first advice you would give Senator John McCain about handling the current crisis?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MITT ROMNEY: Well, first of all the federal reserve has taken the appropriate action to make sure that institutions which could, if they failed hurt a lot of people that they don't fail. Secondly you have to make sure we don't add new government spending programs and we don't raise taxes. The worse thing you can do with an economy in trouble is raise taxes. And I really would call on Barack Obama to say, you know what? It's not the time to raise taxes, it's instead a time to smooth the market out, to try to rekindle the growth of our economy, lower taxes, and get ourselves from sending $700 billion a year to foreign countries for oil, let's keep that money here, let's drill in America, something Barack Obama opposes. He's wrong on that one.

ROBERTS: Let me come back to the point you made about the bailout of AIG. John McCain said the fed should not be bailing out these financial institutions.

ROMNEY: Well, what he said they shouldn't be bailing out institutions by, if you will, giving more money to the shareholders and the management. But he does believe that when the federal reserve and treasury have evaluated a particular enterprise and conclude that their failure will hurt more people in this country than the bailout would cost, why then, of course, the right course is to help those enterprises stay alive and they carried out that analysis. They said AIG failing would hurt more taxpayers than it's going to cost us than if we help them get on their feet. The nice thing about this particular program is the Federal Reserve now is going to be an 80% owner of AIG. So we don't just put the money in, and take the downside if you will. We now are going to be the owner of this enterprise and make sure we get the upside of this as well, when this thing's turned around.

ROBERTS: Governor, during the primary campaign you were always stressing the importance of business experience as a prerequisite to become president of the United States. Let me remind viewers of something you said the first of February of this year, back in Denver, regarding Senator john McCain.

ROMNEY: He has a number of things that are great strengths of his but he happened to say that the economy was not his strong suit. Well, at a time like this, in a country like this, I think it's important to have a president for whom the economy is his strong suit.

ROBERTS: So Governor Romney, things have gotten worse with the economy since then. The question is based on what you said back there in February, is John McCain the right person for the job at this time in America's economic history?

ROMNEY: Well, I was trying to convince people that I was the right guy for the job and that just didn't work, as you know. In the current setting there's no question that john McCain has by far the most economic experience of any of the people that are either in the presidential or the vice presidential contest.

ROBERTS: How so? What's the economic experience that he has?

ROMNEY: Well, he's been in the Senate for 25 years and has been through recessions, through upsides, down sides.

ROBERTS: Joe Biden has been there for 36 years.

ROMNEY: Joe Biden has been concentrating on foreign policy, by the way he's been wrong on foreign policy for 30 years. John McCain has been concentrating on the commerce committee for instance, and that's given him the kind of experience that allowed him to work with President Reagan, President Ford, President Clinton, and so forth and fashion economic policy, that frankly has allowed America to outgrow our European competitors, to create many tens of millions of jobs when they haven't, and it's that kind of policy that's or experience that's allowed him to say you know what? Don't raise tax now, keep taxes down. Make sure we trade with our countries and do what we have to do to become energy independent. Don't do what Barack Obama is saying, which is not allowing drilling offshore, not building a nuclear power plant. So that's why John McCain has a plan to actually get this economy going again.

ROBERTS: Governor, as you know, yesterday McCain's senior advisor said none of these candidates has the experience to run a major corporation like Hewlett Packard. You always, again whether you're trying to sell yourself or not, touted the importance of business experience, the importance of actually being a hands on manager as an important prerequisite to become president of the United States because you know how to manage budgets. You talk about John McCain's business experience, then Carly Fiorina says he doesn't have the experience to run a corporation.

ROMNEY: Well she says that no one has the experience running for office, to run a corporation. I think she's just misinformed in that regard. I would be happy to hire John McCain and Sarah Palin to run a business that I'm an investor in. I can also tell you that when you compare John McCain with Barack Obama, it's a pretty clear comparison that John McCain has experience that's been, a lot of developed judgment that you need in a time like this and Barack Obama who has been a community organizer and then a state senator. Who's been a U.S. Senator for three years, two of which, years he's been running for president. He just doesn't have any relevance experience to help our economy in such a critical time and that's why I think you're finding that John McCain is surging in public support, bigger and bigger crowds because they realize you got to have a person who has been there, who has been at the helm when the seas are rough. That's exactly where he's been during these last 25 years.

Mitt Romney Touts McCain's Economic Experience and Plan to Get U.S. Out of Current Crisis (FNC 09/17/08 7:57am)
STEVE DOOCY: A lot of people out there on Main Street are looking at Wall Street and they're saying man, you guys really messed things up. What is, and I was reading that you had some talking points about what John McCain wants to do with the economy and financial reform.

MITT ROMNEY: Well, first of all, with regards to Wall Street, he wants to put in place a program of transparency so we can see what's actually on the balance sheets of the various companies there. Secondly, he wants to revamp the entire regulatory structure so we don't have the kind of excesses which were caused when republicans and democrats all were encouraging these banks to put out mortgages that were being handed out like candy and it caused this mortgage crisis and the housing crisis. Beyond that, he wants to strengthen our economy by lowering our taxes, making trade available throughout the world but by making sure it's fair and of course, investing in new technology. Technology is really the future growth vehicle for our economy. It is a plan that has been tested and tried time and time again. I really think that it's critical for us to say that Barack Obama's plan of raising taxes and cutting off trade, and also saying that we can't drill for more oil, that's a plan that would cause really economic hardship in this country.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: Governor, I've been wondering if your phone has been ringing at 3:00 a.m. the last few nights from John McCain because you, no doubt, would have a lot of information to share on how this economy should be handled. By all accounts, John McCain and Barack Obama are not economic experts. So does it rely then back on experience of the individual or their advisors?

ROMNEY: Well, of course you want to have a president who understands how the economy works, and who has been in the economy at a time when it has had ups and downs. John McCain has been in the U.S. Senate 25 years. He was part of the Reagan revolution which helped really propel the growth of our economy. Frankly, we have been adding tens of millions of jobs when Europe has been adding no jobs other than government jobs. So John McCain was part of that. He has been with the nation's economic gurus as we went through policy that built this economy, and he has been through good times and bad times. He has learned from that experience. Barack Obama at the time was a community organizer and a state senator. He just doesn't have the experience, I believe, to lead the country at such a critical time for our economy.

DOOCY: And it is a critical time. Of course, Governor, today we are talking about the bridge loan the government is making to AIG, and then a couple of weeks ago there was the bailout of Fannie and Freddie that is the pillar of our mortgage institutions here in the united states of America. It's interesting, though, when Barack Obama says he's going to fix all that stuff, when you look at, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, the top three U.S. Senators who have gotten the most money from employees and pacs at Fannie and Freddie, number one is Chris Dodd who runs that banking committee, number three is John Kerry who's been there for a very long time, and number two is Barack Obama, who has only been there two years and yet he has wracked up $120,000 in contributions from the people at Fannie and Freddie.

ROMNEY: Well, that's quite a revelation, I must admit, and there's no question that politicians, frankly, on both sides of the aisle, in many cases are far too cozy with the enterprises that they regulate or that they oversee, and in this case, you found one more circumstance of that happening. I do think that it was appropriate for the Federal Reserve and for the treasury to step in and to stabilize these enterprises where a lot of people's future are connected to those enterprises. I'm not arguing that it was a mistake to help AIG and Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, but the connection between money and politics is very, very disappointing, indeed.

Pawlenty tries to Dismiss McCain's Flip Flop on Deregulation (NBC: 09/17/08 07:12am)
MATT LAUER: Governor Pawlenty, yesterday on our program your Presidential Candidate John McCain said that he did not think the government should bail out AIG. The government did. Did he get it wrong? Did he not understand it?

TIM PAWLENTY: Well certainly Senator McCain does not support the bailout of AIG on a philosophical or ideal level, matt. But if you look at the practicalities of the implications of letting AIG fail in terms of what it would mean to average citizens and the destabilizing of the credit markets and the financial markets, something needed to be done. So he is willing to at least look at these kind of options.

LAUER: Well well wait a second; he did not think it should happen. So did he not understand the impact that AIG's failing would have on those average citizens you just talked about?

PAWLENTY: Well I think he does understand it. He doesn't, like he said yesterday, he doesn't support the bailout but he also understands that something needed to be done to try to minimize or mitigate the consequences of these kinds of institutions crashing.

LAUER: On this program yesterday John McCain said this: "Greed and excess and corruption has beset Wall Street. They've treated it like a casino and the need to be held accountable and stop walking away with these fat cat packages." This is a guy throughout his entire career has wanted less government regulation, is he now calling for more government regulation.

PAWLENTY: Well I think Matt you got to look at the whole record and in 2005, 2006 and in early 2000 John McCain is the one who said Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac are out of control. He authored legislation to try to clean it up and crack down at them; the congress did not pass that. He also has talked about these kind of issues and the need to regulate and crack down on thee industries in the past. You also look at where the money is coming from and form Wall Street Barack Obama has received more money from Senator McCain. SO it's not accurate Matt, it is not accurate to say that Senator McCain has not purposed to crack down on institutions like Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac and he saw this coming in 2005 and 2006 when he proposed legislation to address it. He also has said by the way, just to respond to my friend Governor Richardson, the answer in this crisis is not to raise taxes and do things that are going to discourage job growth like Barack Obama wants to do.

PAWLENTY: One of the reasons that Barack Obama opted out of the public financing system is because he had created his own small dollar, grassroots fundraising. It sure didn't look like that at Barbara Streisand's house last night.

The Break-up: Media's Love Affair With John McCain Is Over, But Why? (FNC 09/17/08 10:20am)
MEGYN KELLY: Well believe it or not, once there was a cozy relationship between John McCain and the reporters who crammed onto the Straight Talk Express. Yes, it is true. Hardly remember it right? Well, that is because now it is quite apparent that the love fest is officially over. […] Well McCain's former mainstream media fans slamming him in print, and on TV, just about everywhere now. So what exactly caused the breakup of the love affair? […] People loved John McCain's accessibility to the media, he'd invite people on the back of the Straight Talk Express, there was no curtain between him and the media.

BERNIE GOLDBERG: I never believed that was the real reason, that was always the conventional wisdom reason. I think the reason why the media used to love John McCain is that he was running against George Bush, who was perceived as a conservative, and that's why they liked him. They liked him because John McCain was not reliably conservative. That John McCain seemed to like sticking his thumb in Republican eyes, in that he seemed more concerned with what liberal democrats would think of him over what conservative republicans would. That's why they used to like him. The reason the love affair is over, a couple of reasons, first, it soured when he was running not against a republican, but against a liberal democrat. That'll sour the liberal media on any republican. Then, the second reason which the media never even factored in, he might actually win. They never counted on that. The third reason is that they think he sold out. How dare he put a Sarah Palin, whom they detest, on the ticket. If only he had put Joe Lieberman, who on almost every issue under the sun is a liberal democrat, on the ticket then he would have been principled. But Sarah Palin? And the final reason, and the newest one, is that John McCain they say isn't the same John McCain. Now he's nasty, he runs campaign commercials that aren't 100 percent true. Well, boo hoo, that's what politics is about. It's not 100 percent true, and neither are Obama's. When Obama said that John McCain would keep us in Iraq for a hundred years, that wasn't the entire statement. He said, as long as there are no casualties, as long as no Americans were getting hurt. And I don't remember the media being upset about that.

KELLY: This is a good example. When McCain stretched the truth on the taxes, we called him out on that. When Obama stretched the truth on the hundred year war, we called him out on that. The bias is seen when they attack only on one side, and they leave the other side unmentioned. And the viewers don't always pick up on that because it's sort of an absence of information that they're being effected by.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOLDBERG: And there's a brand new example that's only 24 hours old. Carly Fiorina, McCain's chief economist on the campaign, said that neither Sarah Palin nor McCain was qualified to run a major American corporation. And there's more to it. The Obama campaign directed reporters to a YouTube spot where McCain said that, and they cut it off right at that point, that neither McCain or Sarah Palin was ready to run a company. But what she said in the very next breath, not a minute later, a nano-second later, is that neither is Barack Obama or Joe Biden. And the media didn't get upset about that.

KELLY: You mentioned Palin, what is it about Governor Palin that has sent some in the mainstream media over the edge?

GOLDBERG: To me, that's the single most important question that could be asked about Palin. And I don't believe it's simply that liberal reporters don't like her conservative positions. I don't believe that that's the entirety of it. I think it's a cultural issue more than it's a political issue. The idea that, what is it with this woman, she has five kids, she has a baby with down syndrome, her daughter's having a baby. I mean, liberal elite people they have daughters who are having sex, and who get pregnant, but if you're going to go to Princeton next semester you don't have a baby. What is it with this woman? A Canadian writer summed it up perfectly, she said Sarah Palin has captured the white trash vote in America. That's how the media sees this. They see Middle America, they see people who aren't like them, as white trash. And that's the problem.

McCain Attacks Obama for Fundraising During an Economic Crisis While his Surrogates Suggest McCain Invented the Blackberry and Could Not Run a Major Corporation (NBC 09/17/08 07:11am)
JOHN MCCAIN: Talking about siding with the people, siding with the people, just before he flew off to Hollywood for a fundraiser with Barbara Streisand and his celebrity friends. Let me tell you my friends there is no place I'd rather be than here with the working men and women of Ohio.

ANDREA MITCHELL: But John McCain came close the night before. Raising more than $5 Million at a fancy hotel in Miami from his top donors.

TED JOHNSON: This is the point in the process where you want to appeal to the regular guy; you don't want to make it look like your elite.

MITCHELL: McCain and Obama are crisscrossing the country raising millions in private, in public trading charges about a bad economy.

JOHN MCCAIN: Sarah Palin and I are going to reform Wall Street; we're going to reform Washington.

MITCHELL: Rejoined Tuesday by Sarah Palin, McCain Proposed a 9/11-style commission to find out what went wrong with Wall Street.

OBAMA: This isn't 9/11. We know how we got into this mess. What we need now is leadership that gets us out.

MCCAIN: Senator Obama saw an economic crisis and has found a political opportunity. My friends this is not a time for political opportunist. This is a time for leadership.

MITCHELL: Along the way a few stumbles, McCain's economic advisor suggested the Senator's commerce committee even helped create the blackberry. Later another aid defended that as a boneheaded joke. Then a top McCain surrogate trying to defend what she had said about Palin didn't do any favors for McCain: When you were asked whether Sarah Palin had the experience to run a major company like Hewlett Packard, which you did, and you said no I don't, but you know what, that's not what she's running for.

CARLY FIORINA: Well I don't think John McCain could run a major corporation, I don't think Barack Obama could run a major corporation.

John McCain Wins the "Generic Off" Contest for his Attempt to Change the Meaning of Fundamental (CMDY: 09/16/08 09:10pm)
JON STEWART: While the crisis on Wall Street will ultimately affect millions of Americans, yesterday the crisis affected four Americans in a deeply personal way.

JOHN MCCAIN: The American economy is in a crisis.

BARACK OBAMA: The most serious financial crisis that we have seen in generations.

JOE BIDEN: The crisis that you've been facing on Main Street is now hitting Wall Street.

SARAH PALIN: Let me tell you something that is going on today in our world, particularly here in our nation that needs some shakin up and some fixin.

STEWART: Did she win a contest? What, is it a calling? We gotta do some shakin up. I see what is happening here, it's an economic crisis, complicated issue, the solutions that are needed are probably unpopular and undoubtedly confusing, perhaps it's time for a good old fashion candidate Generic Off. Generic Off brought to you by soap and food. Food it's what's for eating. The candidates flipped a coin to decide who went first but the coin was repossessed. What the heck lets here from the Junior Senator from Illinois:

OBAMA: We're going to get the economy back on track and our financial institutions back on track.

STEWART: Well in sir, forceful sounding, totally empty. Like a hollow piñata. Republicans, your response:

MCCAIN: We've got to fix it. We got to fix it and we will.

STEWART: We must fix it. We must use some sort of tool, an economic tool that was made in America, McCain 08!

BIDEN: I count John McCain as a personal friend. I don't doubt that John cares, he just doesn't think, he doesn't think that we have any responsibility to help people that are hurting.

STEWART: This is not a passive aggressive off. This is a generic off. John McCain is a good man he's just a horrible human being. He's a brave soldier, but a stupid idiot. He kills babies. I love him, he's terrible. This is a huge opening for the Republican's, […] lets hear from "could possibly be President" Palin:

PALIN: This crisis happened for several reasons.

STEWART: Wow, wow, this is a Generic Off, reasons, that's dangerous territory. Tread carefully. I hope they are generic reasons.

PALIN: Several reasons, which have to be addressed right now.

STEWART: You've given us a what and a when, don't give us a how.

PALIN: Guys and Gals, our regulatory system is outdated and it needs a complete overhaul.

STEWART: Oh Guys and Gals, dudes and dames, don't pay any attention to what she's saying. Do not heed her call; she is not actually suggesting that the government be responsible for regulating the financial markets in anyway, brohems and betties.

PALIN: Our economy will grow, and we will get government out of the way of private sector progress.

STEWART: Great save! She only got specific enough to completely contradict herself. We need more regulation, we need more regulations so that we can get government out of the economy, and then normal people's brains can explode. All right Johnny McCainy, she set them up, mow them down.

MCCAIN: Still, the fundamentals of our economy are strong.

STEWART: NOOOO! That is generic but it is also wrong. You're supposed to talk about crisis. You know what is going to happen now. Oh in a few hours: [Attack ad show] Don't you know the Internet moves quickly now sir? It looks like curtains for Senator McCain, but as in any generic off you get one more chance to go into the retraction chamber. Where you can either take back what you said about the fundamentals of our economy, or fundamentally try to change the meaning of fundamental.

MCCAIN: I was talking about the fundamentals of America, which is the workers, their productivity, their innovation, their incredible performance for many many years.

STEWART: Sure you were, ladies and gentlemen we have a winner. That was John McCain speaking from his new circular talk express. Whatever it is, shoot from the hips, tell it like it is John McCain. Apparently John McCain is the only POW to be brainwashed after his captivity.

Local Tampa News Covers McCain Speech on Economy, Interviews Him on Same as Bush, Sarah Palin, Reform
(WFLA-NBC-FL 09/16/08 11:01pm)
KEITH CATE: The economy was once again the hot topic on the campaign trail today. Senator John McCain talking about it during his stop at Tampa. The republican presidential candidate spoke to a crowd of more than 4,000 people at the Tampa convention center. While in south Tampa he also shot a new television ad before heading to the battleground state of Ohio where he talked a little more about the economy. And there was a new twist in his remarks. Yesterday he said the fundamentals of the economy are strong. Today he defined or perhaps refined fundamentals not as economic facts and figures but as working people. Tonight more from our exclusive interview with John McCain. During our previous newscast you heard him answer questions about taxes, offshore drilling and a national catastrophe fund but we also asked him about governor Sarah Palin, his ties to president bush and the slogan "change."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And this idea of change, this is something Obama has used the word over and over since beginning his campaign. But you said change is more than just a slogan, but it looks like you are embracing this idea of change. Is change the one thing that's going to get you and Governor Palin to the white house, more so than this idea of experience, or lack of experience?

JOHN MCCAIN: Reform of government, and I have a record of reform. Senator Obama does not. Governor Palin has a record of reform, Senator Obama does not. Reform and prosperity, the economy is the main issue, obviously. It is affecting this election and all Americans. So we have to reform government in order to restore trust and confidence, and create jobs and fix our economy. Senator Obama has no record of ever being actively engaged in these issues. And I fought against my party. He hasn't.

CATE: Democrats keep trying to paint you as the next President Bush. Can you give me three examples of how you differ?

MCCAIN: The war in Iraq, climate change, spending, torture of prisoners. There's a very long list. I have called attention to climate change a long time ago. I opposed the spending practices. I vociferously spoke out and was criticized in my own party against the way the Iraq war was being conducted. Senator Obama has never taken on his party on a single issue.

CATE: Governor Sarah Palin has spoken, well, when she speaks a lot of people respond but she clearly sparked the republican base out there. Some have wondered though, would she be your vice-presidential running mate had Senator Obama chosen Hillary Clinton as his running mate?

MCCAIN: I wouldn't have had his election as part of the calculation. My selection is what's best for America.

Local Tampa News Covers McCain Speech on Economy, Interviews Him on Offshore Drilling (WFLA-NBC-FL 09/16/08 6:01pm)

JEFF PATTERSON: John McCain today flanked by his wife and supporters but he wasted no time focusing his message on the troubles on Wall Street. A week ago the focus of the nation seemed to be on John McCain's choice of a vice-presidential running mate and her lipstick. Today the senator focused his campaign and his remarks on the economy. […] Following yesterday's collapse on wall street, McCain told a crowd of more than 4,000 supporters at the Tampa Convention Center that greed and bad decisions are to blame […] McCain says government has a clear responsibility to act in the public interest in the face of an economic collapse. […] McCain spoke for just 17 minutes in front of an enthusiastic crowd. eleven of those minutes were focused on wall street. But he used part of his brief stay to attack his opponent. […] McCain also spoke today about ending America's dependence on foreign oil by increasing renewable sources of energy and increasing drilling offshore for American oil and natural gas reserves.

GAYLE SIERENS: And there were some demonstrators outside the convention center during McCain's visit. They protested his stance on the war and his choice of Governor Sarah Palin as his running mate. However most were impressed with his message and the man.

KAY WEEKS: I think he said right on the button things that I wanted to hear, that if he's going to do those things, we'll have a better government because of it.

ALDY SANDS: I like him. he's a sound guy. he's got a lot to say. I hope he's our next president.

JOEY VARS: I came out today just to show support for John McCain. I think he has great leadership ability and should be able to make our nation prosper.

KEITH CATE: During our exclusive interview with Senator John McCain we asked him about offshore drilling and if a compromise is in the works.

Again, a chant at this forum, drill, drill, drill. it's a big issue. Both parties in Congress now talking about reducing the currents 125-mile buffer in Florida's gulf coast to 50. Senator Bill Nelson democrat strongly opposed. Governor Crist seems to favor it. There seems to be a compromise in place, brewing on Capital Hill. Do you think that compromise will take place, maybe by November, and what will the result be for Florida?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, democrats are caving in. they oppose nuclear power. they oppose offshore drilling. they oppose most everything new and innovative. I hope that we reach an agreement. But it's got to be, one, the states agree. I want the states to be able to agree to that. But I have been for it ever since gas went to four dollars a gallon. And Senator Obama has opposed it, just as he is opposed to storing and reprocessing spent nuclear fuel. so it's very clear our different positions on this. Now maybe he will switch again as he has on many others.

CATE: Your running mate, Governor Sarah Palin supports the idea of drilling for oil in ANWR. I'm just wondering if she is getting you to soften up on your stance against it?

Local Tampa News Covers McCain Protesters and Clashes Outside of Event (WFTS-ABC-FL 09/16/08 6:02pm)
REBECCA MEDINA: Good evening. You are absolutely right, there was definitely a clash of ideas out here today and as the crowd continued to grow throughout the day, so did the tension. The crowd waited patiently inside to see their republican pick for the presidency. As some supporters cheered and chanted, one teacher brought his government class for a lesson. […] But as these excited folks inside anticipated the arrival of John McCain, others outside just wanted to blast McCain. Antiwar protesters, pro-choice advocates, union workers, and college students all at the convention center to tell John McCain… [Obama! Obama!] As the hours passed, the crowd of protesters outside got a bit bigger, louder, and angrier. especially whether they came face-to-face with republican supporters. One McCain supporter rigged a sign for one of the protesters. Others just lashed out in a war of words. […] This went on for an hour after John McCain spoke. And in all of the name calling and screaming from both sides, there was never actual talk of the issue. Never a single conversation about the war in Iraq, the economy, abortion, or any other issues so eloquently painted on all of these signs. And there is some good news tonight about what happened out here today, no one, absolutely no one ended up in the slammer.

Given that you are too busy to give an interview could you perhaps send to me a statement by Mrs Clinton on the Greek situation, the economic crisis but also the refugee crisis? Perhaps also a short comment on what can the Greeks hope from her Presidency if she is elected?
That could be enough to make an article about her campaign so far.
Thank you in advance

AD WATCH:
New "Grand Oil Party" Attack Ad Touts McCain's Failed Solutions, Falsely Claims Obama Offers "No New Solutions"

Washington, D.C.----The Republican National Committee (RNC) began airing a new attack ad meant to highlight John McCain's so--called solutions to our energy crisis, while falsely attacking Obama over his energy plan. The ad began airing in the battleground states of Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin and will run through July 15. It can be viewed at: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gE8_NecN3WA.

"What this ad really shows is that John McCain and the Republican Party only have more of the same to offer when it comes to energy--more drilling; more dirty, dangerous, and distracting nuclear power plants; and more schemes designed to pad Big Oil's bottom line while denying consumers real relief at the pump," said Cathy Duvall, Sierra Club Political Director. "And while John McCain claims he wants to stand up to special interests, his party is spending $3 million on false and misleading attack ads against Barack Obama--after raking in more than $3.6 million from the oil industry. While Barack Obama is offering a visionary plan to make the clean energy future a reality, it's John McCain who's sticking to the party line on energy: the 'Grand Oil Party' line."

RNC Ad Touts John McCain's Outdated and Misguided Energy Plan:

John McCain's Misguided Gas Tax Plan Would Offer No Relief At The Pump

* John McCain's plan has been denounced by over 200 leading economists--including 4 Nobel Prize winners. (Source: Bloomberg News, 05/05/2008)
* The same leading economists specifically note that the plan would offer no relief at the pump and could merely pad Big Oil's bottom line with an additional 18 cents per gallon. (Source: http://www.politico.com/static/PPM43_080502_list_gastax.html)

John McCain's Offshore Drilling Flip--Flop is Dirty, Dangerous,and Would Do Nothing to Lower Gas Prices

* Instead of straight talk, John McCain went straight to Houston and called for giving the oil industry exactly what it's wanted for 30 years----the unfettered "exploration and exploitation" of our coasts, to use McCain's own descriptions of his proposal. (Source: Washington Post, 06/16/2008)

* John McCain repeats the lie that offshore drilling is environmentally safe and that no spills occurred as a result of hurricanes Rita and Katrina. In fact, the two storms resulted in 6 major, 5 medium, and over 5,000 minor spills--resulting in a total of over 9 million gallons of oil spilled. (Source: U.S. Coast Guard:

John McCain Offers Nothing More Than Empty Rhetoric on 'Alternative' Energy

* John McCain talks about renewable energy every single day, yet has actively opposed the policies needed to make the clean energy economy a reality.
* John McCain--like President Bush, coal companies, and the utility industry--opposes a Renewable Electricity Standard and has consistently voted against such a standard in the past. (Sources: 2005 Senate Vote #141, 6/16/2005; 2002 Senate Vote #50, 3/14/2002; 2002 Senate Vote #55, 3/21/2002; 2002 Senate Vote #59, 3/21/2002)
* John McCain believes the renewable energy industry is "doing fine" and doesn't need any incentives. While he offered a $300 million gimmick on electric cars, he has voted against $290 million for clean energy. Meanwhile, John McCain favors billions in new and existing subsidies for dirty, dangerous, and distracting nuclear power. (Sources: Grist, 10/1/07, http://www.grist.org/feature/2007/10/01/mccain/; 2006 Senate Vote #42, 3/14/2006)
* If key clean energy incentives that are in danger of expiring soon are not renewed, it could cost more than 116,000 hardworking Americans in the wind and solar industries alone their jobs and sacrifice $19 billion in economic growth. Twice, when every single other Senator voted and measures to renew these critical incentives lost by just a single vote, John McCain didn't even show up to vote when he could have made the difference. John McCain's Tax Plan Would Benefit Big Oil

* John McCain's tax plan includes a dramatic 10 percent cut in the federal corporate tax rate, as well as allowing added deductions for investments in equipment and technology.
* John McCain's tax plan would deliver a $3.8 billion tax cut to the five largest American oil companies alone. It would also cost a stunning $1.7 trillion overall. (Source: Center for American Progress Action, 05/27/2008)

John McCain's Global Warming Plan is Outdated and Favors Special Interests
John McCain may have shown leadership when he introduced his global warming plan in 2002; however, his plan remains stuck in the past.

* Unlike Obama's plan, it fails to do what scientists tell us is necessary to avert the most catastrophic effects of global warming: an emissions reduction of 80 percent by 2050.
* Unlike Obama's plan, it gives away hundreds of billions of dollars in pollution permits to polluters--Big Oil, Big Coal, and others. It also lavishes billions in new subsidies on the nuclear industry--one of the most heavily subsidized industries in history.

John McCain Wants $1 TRILLION Worth of New Nuclear Plants

* John McCain wants to build 45 new nuclear plants by 2030 and then 55 more after that--effectively doubling the number of plants and amount of highly toxic waste we'd have to deal with. (Source: Bloomberg News, 06/19/2008)

* By utility companies' own estimates in recent regulatory filings, this plan could cost at least $1 trillion. (Source: EnergyBiz, May/June 2008)

* McCain admits that it's extremely dangerous and insecure to have thousands of tons of high--level nuclear waste sitting at reactors across the country, yet proposes doubling the size of the problem. (Source: John McCain, YouTube: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=GPlaHQCKc34)

John McCain Wants to Stick Nevadans with 77,000 Tons of Nuclear Waste Forever, Yet 'Wouldn't Be Comfortable' With It Traveling Through His Own State

* John McCain is one of the biggest proponents of the unsafe and unproven Yucca Mountain waste repository site.
* Waste would have to travel through major population centers in at least 43 states on its way to Nevada site. (Source: State of Nevada: http://www.state.nv.us/nucwaste/states/us.htm)
* John McCain says he wouldn't be comfortable with waste traveling through his own state on its way to Yucca Mountain.

RNC Ad Blatantly Lies, Claims Obama Offers 'No New Solutions':

Some 'New Solutions' Offered by Barack Obama:

* Invest $150 billion over ten years to build the clean energy economy and create 5,000,000 new jobs.
* Giving American automakers the tools they need to double fuel economy standards to 50 miles per gallon.
* Require 25 percent of our electricity to come from renewable sources by 2025.
* Develop and invest in next--generation cellulosic biofuels and produce 2 billion gallons by 2013, to help get us off of oil without the negative environmental and economic consequences of corn ethanol.
* Make our buildings greener by improving the energy efficiency of new buildings by 50 percent and existing building by 25 percent over the next ten years.
* Make all new buildings net--zero or carbon--neutral by 2030.
* Introduce a low--carbon fuel standard to help fight global warming and reduce our dependence on oil without turning to dangerous alternatives like oil shale, tar sands, and liquid coal.
* Use more of the energy we're already producing by investing in a digital smart grid.

RNC Ad Blatantly Lies, Claims Obama Offers 'No New Solutions':

Some 'New Solutions' Offered by Barack Obama:
Invest $150 billion over ten years to build the clean energy economy and create 5,000,000 new jobs.
Giving American automakers the tools they need to double fuel economy standards to 50 miles per gallon.
Require 25 percent of our electricity to come from renewable sources by 2025.
Develop and invest in next--generation cellulosic biofuels and produce 2 billion gallons by 2013, to help get us off of oil without the negative environmental and economic consequences of corn ethanol.
Make our buildings greener by improving the energy efficiency of new buildings by 50 percent and existing building by 25 percent over the next ten years.
Make all new buildings net--zero or carbon--neutral by 2030 .
Introduce a low--carbon fuel standard to help fight global warming and reduce our dependence on oil without turning to dangerous alternatives like oil shale, tar sands, and liquid coal.
Use more of the energy we're already producing by investing in a digital smart grid.

Sen. Clinton's Campaign:

CLINTON STUMPS "WITH GUSTO" IN PUERTO RICO. ABC News (5/27, Tapper) reports on Sen. Hillary Clinton's campaign events in Puerto Rico over the weekend, "where she shimmied to Enrique Iglesias, swigged from a bottle of Presidente beer and once again proclaimed her determination to continue her longshot campaign." ABC notes that while Clinton, in a New York Daily News op-ed, "acknowledged, for the first time, that the odds of her becoming her party's presidential nominee are stacked against her," Clinton "campaigned in Puerto Rico with her usual gusto. She promised she would bring voting rights to the island, saying, 'I believe you should have a vote in picking the president too.' On Sunday, however, she seemed to back off that pledge, saying, 'All people are entitled to a representative form of government. And all levels of government. The people of Puerto Rico should have the right to determine by a majority vote the status you choose from among all the options.'"

In previous coverage, the AP (5/26, Barrett) reported on the Clintons meeting with families in Puerto Rico, noting that "It is the Clintons' long history with Puerto Rico--and Hispanic voters in general--that gives Clinton a decided edge in the island's presidential primary on June 1, not to mention that her home state of New York has approximately 1 million Puerto Ricans." The piece notes, however, that Clinton faces long odds to defeat Obama.

In previous coverage, the AP (5/26) reports that on Sunday, Clinton "spoke of her determination to not give up her presidential campaign. Speaking to a congregation at the Pabellon de la Victoria evangelical church, Clinton spoke about faith in the face of adversity. 'There isn't anything we cannot do together if we seek God's blessing and if we stay committed and are not deterred by the setbacks that often fall in every life,' Clinton said."

Clinton Decries Puerto Rican Vets' Inability To Vote. In a posting on its 'From the Road' blog, CBS News (5/26, Suarez) reports, "During an evening Memorial Day service in old San Juan, Hillary Clinton spoke of the unfairness in U.S. policy toward Puerto Ricans who risk their lives in the U.S. military and have their voting rights stripped when they return home to the island. Clinton called the action 'an injustice and an insult.' Clinton's message on a day when Americans honor those service men and women who gave their lives in combat was simple: every U.S. citizen should be given a right to vote. 'I believe it is long past time that we give the people of Puerto Rico - United States citizens all - an equal voice in the vote for the commander-in-chief who sends young Puerto Ricans to war.'"

Clinton Holds "Raucous" Rally For Puerto Rican Union. CNN (5/27, Hamby) reports that Clinton's rally before the Servidores Públicos Unidos union in Ponce, PR, Monday was "the most raucous rally of her Puerto Rico campaign swing," noting that "[t]he union operates as an affiliate of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, which has endorsed Clinton and spent millions on her campaign's behalf. AFSCME President Gerald McEntee was on hand in Ponce to introduce Clinton, but he spent a good chunk of his speech soliciting boos for Barack Obama." Meanwhile, Clinton "delivered a speech similar to others she has made on the island, pledging to offer economic incentives to the island, promising to resolve the issue of Puerto Rico's status by the end of her first term, and reminding voters that she represents an estimated one million Puerto Ricans in New York."

NBC Nightly News (5/26, story 4, 2:10, Cowan, 9.87M) reported Clinton's "three day weekend" in Puerto Rico "make her look pretty carefree, but weighing on her mind were her comments on Friday when she reminded an editorial board that Bobby Kennedy's run for the White House ended tragically in June. In a letter to the 'New York Daily News' on Sunday she insisted the media had taken them entirely out of context. She never intended to bring up something completely unthinkable and any link to Barack Obama was construed in a way that flies in the face of everything I stand for. The Obama campaign backed off its criticism."

The CBS Evening News (5/26, story 5, 1:50, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "Puerto Ricans can't vote for president in November and only 55 delegates are at stake in its Democratic primary. But Senator Hillary Clinton is embracing the islanders as potential saviors. Clinton has spent the last two days on the island drinking in the atmosphere and admiration, some El Presidente beer too, campaigning for every vote in Sunday's primary. She seems intent on taking the fight all the way to the convention floor in August."

CARTER CALLS FOR CLINTON TO BOW OUT AFTER FINAL PRIMARIES. The AP (5/27) reports, "Jimmy Carter says Hillary Clinton should give up her fight for the Democratic presidential nomination soon after the final round of primaries next week. ... Carter has not declared a favorite. But as a former president, he's one of the party's superdelegates and he predicts there will be a rush of announcements soon after the last primary a week from tomorrow. Carter says at that point, he thinks it will be time for Clinton to 'give it up.'"

Clinton Defends Decision To Remain In Race. In an op-ed in the New York Daily News (5/26), Sen. Hillary Clinton "set the record straight" that her comments about the campaign of Robert Kennedy were merely a comparison of the relative lengths of Democratic primary races, continuing to "more fully answer the question I was asked: Why do I continue to run, even in the face of calls from pundits and politicians for me to leave this race?" Clinton continues to cite her belief in the possibility to win, adding, "I am not unaware of the challenges or the odds of my securing the nomination - but this race remains extraordinarily close, and hundreds of thousands of people in upcoming primaries are still waiting to vote. As I have said so many times over the course of this primary, if Sen. Obama wins the nomination, I will support him and work my heart out for him against John McCain. But that has not happened yet." Clinton expresses her belief that a continued race will "help unite the Democratic Party" and adds that she is continuing to run "because my parents did not raise me to be a quitter," and for all those women in their 90s who've told me they were born before women could vote, and they want to live to see a woman in the White House."

Writer Applauds Clinton's Campaign, But Says It's Time To "Move On." In a posting on The Nation's (5/26) "Campaign '08" blog, Katrina Vanden Heuvel refutes Bill Clinton's assertion that a media "cover up" has hurt Sen. Hillary Clinton's campaign, suggesting instead that she "made the mistake of running a top down campaign in a rules-changing year, and acceding to a sexism within her campaign that advised her not to apologize for her disastrous vote supporting Bush's war resolution." She continues to lament the "lost" and "squandered" opportunities of Clinton's campaign, and calls for Clinton to "move on," writing, "That is not to say that Hillary Clinton doesn't have every right to campaign through the last primaries on June 3rd. ... But when the polls close on June 3rd, superdelegates should move, expeditiously, to make their decision so that this campaign can refocus on what is at stake in this defining election. And their decision should follow the will of the people."

CLINTON SEEN AS UNLIKELY TO WIN FULL MICHIGAN, FLORIDA EMPANELMENT. The Washington Examiner (5/27, Ferrechio) reports that despite the fact that the Democratic Party panel that will meet next weekend to determine "whether to resurrect some or all of the disqualified delegates from Florida and Michigan" is heavily seeded with such Clinton supporters as top Terry McAuliffe, Harold Ickes, and Alexix Herman, "political experts say there is little chance the panel will grant Clinton's wish of seating every delegate from Florida and Michigan with a full vote proportional to the primary results, as Ickes said they would request. 'Get real,' University of Virginia political science professor Larry J. Sabato said. 'There is no way that is ever going to happen. Ickes knows that and is just using it as a bargaining point.' Sabato and many other political analysts say the DNC's 30-member Rules and Bylaws Committee will likely favor a compromise solution that seats some of the delegates from those two states."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (5/27, Sherman) reports that the Rules Committee's meeting "could be the Clinton campaign's final stand, noting that in the face of Obama's "sizable lead," Clinton is "arguing that the party should reverse its decision and give Michigan and Florida their full slates,...calling it a matter of justice. ... If the party gives Mrs. Clinton what she wants, she'd get 105 delegates from Florida and as many as 73 delegates from Michigan. Mr. Obama would get at least 67 from Florida and 55 from Michigan, if he receives all of the state's 'uncommitted' votes."

Clinton Seen As Maneuvering For Michigan Delegate Issue To Remain Unresolved. "The lead editorial in this morning's Detroit News (5/27), titled "Clinton in Wonderland," argues that as the DNC's Rules Committee takes "another stab next weekend at doing right by their voters in Michigan and Florida," Hillary Clinton, if she "has her way" may well leave Michigan "dangling." Clinton "has an interest in keeping the fate of the Michigan and Florida delegations up in the air. Without a resolution, the delegations of these two influential swing states will have not been accounted for in her duel with Sen. Barack Obama, and that will give her at least a thread of hope to hang onto." Clinton is asking "for an overwhelming majority of the delegates based on her 55 percent vote total" as well as "most of the undecided vote, which totaled 40 percent," a claim that is "as illegitimate as Michigan's Jan. 15 Democratic primary itself." By "continuing the standoff between the two states and the national party," Clinton "can keep her campaign alive all summer and wage a floor fight at the convention."

BOTH WHITE HOUSE, CLINTON CAMPAIGN CRITICAL OF NBC. The AP (5/27, Bauder) reports, "NBC News has managed to achieve the near-impossible this election season in getting Hillary Rodham Clinton and George Bush to agree on something. That something, however, is antipathy toward NBC News." The AP adds that "through its unusual public criticism of NBC's handling of Richard Engel's interview with the president, the Bush administration struck at the soft white underbelly of the news division's co-existence with the opinionated personalities of MSNBC." Bush counselor Ed Gillespie wrote to NBC News President Steve Capus, "I'm sure you don't want people to conclude that there is really no distinction between the 'news' as reported on NBC and the `opinion' as reported on MSNBC, despite the increasing blurring of those lines." Clinton's campaign "didn't want to talk publicly about NBC, but it has been unhappy about the Democratic candidate's treatment by 'Hardball' host Chris Matthews. That culminated in Matthews' apology in January for saying that the reason Clinton is a US senator and candidate for president 'is that her husband messed around.'"

CLINTON ADDS RESERVATION STOP TO MONTANA TOUR. The AP (5/27) reports that the Clinton campaign "says her Montana visit on Tuesday will include an appearance in Pablo on the Flathead Indian Reservation. Clinton is scheduled to hold a town-hall-style meeting at Pablo's Salish Kootenai College at 3:30 p.m. She plans to be in Billings for a rally at 8 p.m. Clinton last visited Montana in April at the same time as Barack Obama, her rival in the race to win the Democratic nomination for president."

The Missoulian (5/26) also reports on Clinton's scheduled event in Pablo.

CLINTONS SEEK NATIVE AMERICAN SUPPORT IN SOUTH DAKOTA. The Rapid City Journal (5/26, Woster) reports, "Bill Clinton began the last full week of South Dakota's primary season on Sunday with a three-stop reservation blitz aimed at inspiring potentially crucial tribal voters to support his wife for president. The former president began the day with an appearance at the Fort Thompson Fire Department hall, speaking from the bed of a pickup truck to a gathering of about 250 members of the Crow Creek Sioux Tribe and non-Native Americans from nearby ranches and towns. Clinton then moved on to the Rosebud and Yankton Sioux reservations for appearances there. The real Clinton candidate in the campaign, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, will follow her husband's reservation tour with a stop at Kyle on the Pine Ridge Reservation during a West River trip Wednesday, as she makes her final push for support before the nation's last two primaries in Montana and South Dakota June 3."

OBAMA PRAISES VETERANS IN FRONT OF FRIENDLY MEMORIAL DAY CROWD IN NEW MEXICO. The Washington Post (5/27, A4, Shear, Vick), in an article that fails to mention Hillary Clinton, except to say that she was ignored by Obama's and McCain's Memorial Day speeches, reports that "the two leading candidates for president made Memorial Day pilgrimages on Monday to this critical swing state, where a closely divided electorate may help determine the outcome of the 2008 battle for the White House." While McCain "used the backdrop of the state's veterans memorial in Albuquerque to pledge his fealty to the military" Obama "went to Las Cruces and praised the 'spirit' of America's diverse fighting corps, which he called the source of the military's true strength." Later, at a town-hall meeting, "Obama did not mention McCain or Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton," but in a speech "made clear his support for [Senator] Webb's bill and said Congress would override a threatened veto by President Bush."

Later, in a post on the Washington Post's "The Trail" blog, (5/27) correspondent Karl Vick posts that, "Sen. Barack Obama spoke for most of an hour about doing right by America's veterans without crossing swords with Sen. John McCain, in a carefully measured Memorial Day appearance that kept the focus on the former service members seated around him on three sides." Obama told the veterans, "I speak to you today with deep humility...My grandfather marched in Patton's Army, but I cannot know what it is to walk into battle like so many of you. My grandmother worked on a bomber assembly line, but I cannot know what it is for a family to sacrifice like so many of yours have...I am the father of two young girls, and I cannot imagine what it is to lose a child. My heart breaks for the families who've lost a loved one." Then Obama "edged into his critique of military and veterans affairs under the Bush administration," and "endorsed legislation that he said would give veterans the same benefits his grandfather's generation enjoyed under the GI Bill."

CBS News (5/27, CBS) reports on its web site that "Hillary Rodham Clinton ended a three-day campaign swing across Puerto Rico the same way many Americans mark Memorial Day - with family, friends and a salute to the sacrifices of military men and women." Clinton is "trying despite the odds against her to catch up to Barack Obama" and "needs something approaching a mathematical miracle." Meanwhile, "Obama marked Memorial Day in New Mexico, a battleground state in the general election," where he addressed a group of Veterans, and, alongside New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, "laid wreaths at a memorial to the state's fallen soldiers." The CBS story then returns to Puerto Rico, where one veteran criticized Clinton for waiting "until the third day of her campaign swing to meet with veterans," noting that "Obama's first stop during his appearance Saturday was to visit with veterans."

Reporting from the Obama Campaign in its "On the Road" Political blog, CBS News (5/27, Gavrilovic) posts, "Despite not having served in the military himself, Barack Obama used his Memorial Day remarks to speak about his family's service. Obama, in supporting the new GI Bill, said "We should make sure that today's veterans get the same benefit that my grandfather got when he came back from World War II...It was a good investment not only for him, but it was a good investment for the country, built our middle class. So we're going to make sure that that gets passed."

OBAMA, MCCAIN OFFER CONTRASTING MESSAGES ON IRAQ. The New York Times (5/27, Zeleny, Falcone, 1.18M) reports Memorial Day "offered at least a preview into the summertime duel between" John McCain and Barack Obama, "who for the first time were campaigning in the same swing state on the same day." As McCain "spoke about the costs and sacrifices of the Iraq war at the Veterans Memorial in Albuquerque, Mr. Obama praised the patriotism of America's soldiers before taking voters' questions - and hearing their frustrations about Iraq and a host of other concerns - at an outdoor forum against the backdrop of the Organ Mountains here." The campaign stops "provided a window into how both men, should they become the nominees of their respective parties, are shaping their candidacies, employing the power of their biographies and honing their arguments in their appeal to voters." In a "20-minute speech, with the flags of all branches of the armed forces at his back, Mr. McCain made 14 references to Iraq." In "10 minutes of prepared remarks, Mr. Obama did not mention Iraq, only raising it when someone in the audience spoke critically of the war in a 30-minute question-and-answer session."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fox News Special Report (5/26, Cameron) reported, "For John McCain, a presidential candidate and decorated Vietnam POW whose ancestors served in every American war since the revolution, Memorial Day is both political and deeply personal." Though "politicking is risky on a day honoring the fallen, he didn't hesitate to describe his dissatisfaction and differences with the Bush Administration's prosecution of the Iraq war." McCain: "As we all know, the American people have grown sick and tired of the war in Iraq. I understand that. Of course, I, too, have been made heartsick by the many mistakes made by civilian and military commanders and the terrible, terrible price we paid for them." McCain: "Though he didn't mention Barack Obama by name, McCain urged veterans and voters to reject Democrats' calls for withdrawal."

NBC Nightly News (5/26, story 5, 2:05, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "Given the holiday McCain turned down the volume of his campaign but still without naming Senator Obama laid out key differences. On the Iraq war McCain urged patience." McCain: "As long as there is a reasonable prospect for succeeding in this war then we must not choose to lose it." O'Donnell: "McCain suggested that he is more willing to take political risks than Obama over a veterans' education bill that McCain claims will discourage re-enlistment. But Obama supports the bill sponsored by Virginia Senator Webb."

MCCAIN TO APPEAR WITH BUSH AT FUNDRAISER. The Wall Street Journal (5/27, Meckler, 2.06M) reports, "President Bush and John McCain will appear together at a fund-raiser in Phoenix Tuesday, the first time in nearly three months that the Republican presidential candidate will be seen beside the man he hopes to succeed." But "with Mr. Bush's popularity at a record low, the McCain campaign has made sure that television footage of the two men together will be minimal. The maneuvering is the latest example of Sen. McCain's aggressive effort to separate himself from the White House, even as he embraces many of the policies that Mr. Bush has promoted throughout his presidency." The Journal adds, "Some congressional Republicans are doing the same, as Republicans brace for what they fear will be a brutal election year. Party leaders now talk openly about the badly damaged 'Republican brand,' as does Sen. McCain."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/26, Henry) also notes that while the event "was initially planned to be open to cameras at the Phoenix Convention Center, it's been moved to a private residence and is now closed to the media. So, there will only be brief pictures of McCain and the president on an airport tarmac."

In Break With Bush, McCain And Lieberman Co-Author Hawkish North Korea Policy Article. The Washington Post's Glen Kessler, who yesterday had a front-page article about the successes of US Diplomacy in North Korea (5/27, Kessler) reports in the Trail blog, that "Sen. John McCain broke today with President Bush's new policy on North Korea, co-authoring an opinion article with Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.) in which he called for a return to Bush's original demand of a complete, verifiable, irreversible disarmament of North Korea's nuclear programs." The more hawkish position taken by McCain and Lieberman urges the US to "use the leverage available from the U.N. Security Council resolution passed after Pyongyang's 2006 nuclear test to ensure the full and complete declaration, disablement and irreversible dismantlement of its nuclear facilities, in a verifiable manner, which we agreed to with the other members of the six-party talks." Kessler notes that the "language concerning North Korea in the article ... is remarkably similar to President Bush's first-term rhetoric, which the White House has largely dropped in recent months."

McCain Will Avoid Bush, Except Where Fundraising Is Concerned. Bloomberg News (5/27, Nichols, Chen) reports, "McCain's challenge in winning the presidency isn't unique. George H.W. Bush in 1988 and Al Gore in 2000 also struggled to chisel an identity separate from a two- term incumbent president of their party." However, "in 1988, Ronald Reagan had a 51 percent approval rating, according to Gallup surveys, and in 2000 Bill Clinton's was 57 percent. Today, President George W. Bush's rating is 28 percent." But according to Republican Strategist Jim Pinkerton, "any sitting president, even one whose approval rating is in the low 30s, can raise money." McCain "has until the Republican nominating convention in September to establish an identity separate from Bush," at which point he must "execute 'his final pivot from the Bush presidency.'" [Subtitle:] For the ALS charity. Bill Clinton may be next.

In the realm of great presidential debates, where every American executive is stacked up against every other on some front, there's now at least one spot where George W. Bush has exceeded Barack Obama: Ability to be doused in ice water.

On Wednesday morning, the former president posted a video on his Facebook page for the ALS Ice Bucket Challenge, the charity event that is still dominating Facebook newsfeeds everywhere.

Laura Bush, the former first lady, poured the water over her husband's head. And, as the challenge goes, Bush passed the ice baton to Bill Clinton.

Bush isn't by any means the first politician (or former politician) to be submerged in ice water for charity. But so far at least, Barack Obama has said that he won't enter the fray, outside of writing a check for the ALS charity. That's despite challenges coming his way from Ethel Kennedy, LeBron James, and, uh, Justin Bieber.

PolitickerNJ: “Sires: 'There's despair in the air;' Christie up against 'right-wing agenda' in prez bid”

By Max Pizarro

August 20, 2014, 8:40 a.m. EDT

JERSEY CITY – Young people are despairing and the Democratic Party provides no hope, says U.S. Rep. Albio Sires (D-8), in a sit down interview Tuesday with PolitickerNJ.

“We are floating on a barge with no direction,” said Sires, the former West New York mayor and Assembly Speaker who whipped Joe Vas of Perth Amboy to win Bob Menendez’s vacant congressional seat.

“I think there’s despair. People see no future. Jobs are limited. I think there’s despair in the air,” said Sires. “Young people are falling into debt. They can’t afford their education. We get calls here all the time.”

Republicans implemented a better redistricting strategy 10 years ago to win statehouses and governorships, Sires said, but the GOP is mired in a fundamental cynical misunderstanding of the role of government in American life.

“It’s all ideology,” Sires said of the Republicans, dismissing the opposition party’s entrenched dislike of President Barack Obama as misguided, ignorant and irresponsible.

“Everything you see in Washington by the GOP comes about because they don’t like the President,” said Sires, who himself has clashed with Obama over immigration and who remains disgusted by Republicans’ unwillingness to address real problems, such as the utter insolvency of the Transportation Trust Fund (TTF) and illegal immigration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Seventy-eight percent of Hispanic women backed Obama's re-election and 72% of Hispanic males. Sires says the President owes those Latinos comprehensive immigration reform, but remains cowed by the GOP.

Gov. Chris Christie continues to make a play for Latino love as he positions himself for a presidential run, but Sires sees a tremendously heavy lift ahead for the New Jersey governor.

"I think he's got a lot of work to do," said the congressman. "He's going to have a hard time with the right wing of the Republican Party in a primary – the party that I see in Washington. This county has to be governed from the middle. But the Republicans right now have a problem with anyone who does not have a right-wing agenda."

For his part, Sires wants former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to run for president.

"I'll probably be with her," he said. "She's the most experienced candidate we have, when you consider her work as secretary of state. She did a good job. Quite frankly, having a woman would be a nice change. I think she's the deepest candidate."

He laments what he sees as a "weak bench" in both parties. If Clinton doesn't run, he doesn't see anyone well positioned in his party to make a run.

As for his longtime ally, Menendez, and the possibility of a role for New Jersey's senior senator in a Clinton White House, Sires said, "He'd be an asset to any president."

Discouraged by national politics, the congressman noted with pleasure the unity of the Hudson County Democratic Organization (HCDO), which tonight will have a fundraiser for West New York Mayor Felix Roque.

"We can always make it better," Sires said of the organization. "But everyone's together. There's no fighting now. No rift. When the HCDO is united, we produce the highest Democratic percentage in the state. Essex produces the largest number of votes; we produce the biggest percentage."

Sires backed Roque for mayor in his hometown four years ago, a partnership that resulted in a torturous tenure for the pain doctor turned local politico, who stared down federal hacking charges.

"He made some mistakes obviously," Sires said of the incumbent mayor. "I chalk that up to inexperience. But I think he's found his way."

National Memo column: Gene Lyons: “Media Won’t Wait Until 2016 To Lie About Hillary Clinton”

By Gene Lyons

August 20, 2014, 12:00 a.m. EDT

I once knew a curmudgeonly physician whose wife practiced family therapy. In her off hours, she often counseled a small army of girlfriends through romantic entanglements. One evening at dinner, the grumpy doctor decided he’d heard enough secondhand tales of woe.

“Look,” he said. “I know people have got to [bleep]. It was covered in the medical school curriculum. But they certainly don’t have to talk about it to the exclusion of all else, do they?”

That’s my attitude toward the 2016 presidential race. I’m assuming that Hillary Clinton’s running because of how ostentatiously she’s not made up her mind. By sitting tight, she basically freezes potential Democratic rivals in place, passively using her lead in opinion polls to prevent others from raising money.

Otherwise, can’t we please, please wait until 2016 to obsess about it around the clock? There will be three World Series, two NBA championships and a couple of NCAA football seasons between now and then. Politically speaking, we’ll be in a different world.

But no, we’re not going to get even an August recess if the Washington infotainment industry gets its way. Witness the recent stir over Clinton’s ill-advised interview with The Atlantic’s Jeffrey Goldberg, a colloquy quickly cartoonized into a rebuke of President Obama that never actually happened.

For now, the only important thing is to recognize how these media quasi-events take shape. Guided by Goldberg, headline writers focused on a throwaway line characterized by the inimitable Maureen Dowd as “a cheap shot at President Obama… calling him a wimp just as he was preparing to order airstrikes against ISIS.”

Clinton said this: “Great nations need organizing principles, and ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle.”

Actually, President Obama’s version of the slogan was earthier. However, turning Hillary’s paraphrase into an insult required ignoring almost everything she said about his administration’s foreign policy.

Why had Obama used the phrase?

“I think he was trying to communicate to the American people that he’s not going to do something crazy,” Clinton said. “I’ve sat in too many rooms with the president. He’s thoughtful; he’s incredibly smart, and able to analyze a lot of different factors that are all moving at the same time. I think he is cautious because he knows what he inherited, both the two wars and the economic front, and he has expended a lot of capital and energy trying to pull us out of the hole we're in. So I think that that's a political message."

Does that sound like a slam to you?

Elsewhere, Clinton added that "it was stupid to do what we did in Iraq and to have no plan about what to do after we did it. That was really stupid."

She'd voted for the Iraq war, you may recall. Dowd certainly remembered. The erratic New York Times columnist bitterly blamed Hillary for the death of her friend Michael Kelly, the first "embedded" journalist to die there. Dowd neglected to mention Kelly's own September 2002 column calling Al Gore "wretched," "vile," "contemptible," and worse for opposing the invasion.

I guess she forgot.

But did Hillary really argue that if Obama had armed Syrian "moderates" as she'd recommended as Secretary of State, that the United States wouldn't have to be bombing ISIS fanatics in Iraq today — blowing to smithereens our own tanks and APCs that they captured from fleeing Iraqi soldiers?

That was another headline take from The Atlantic interview. Once again, no, she did not. Indeed, she reminded Goldberg that the chapter on Syria in her recent book was entitled "A Wicked Problem."

"I can't sit here today," Clinton said, "and say that if we had done what I recommended, and what [then-U.S. Ambassador] Robert Ford recommended, that we'd be in a demonstrably different place….I don't think we can claim to know."

Obama's position was that the idea of an effective fighting force of Syrian "moderates" is essentially a fantasy. He said exactly that to CBS Morning News last May, although he's since asked Congress for $500 million to help train and equip this fantasy army — money he's unlikely to get.

James Fallows argues that people who thought the U.S. could stage-manage the Syrian civil war were deluding themselves: "Yeah, we should have 'done something' in Syria to prevent the rise of ISIS. But the U.S. did a hell of a lot of somethings in Iraq over the past decade, with a lot more leverage that it could possibly have had in Syria. And the result of the somethings in Iraq was… ?"

Well, it was the mad fanatics of ISIS.

Actually, The Atlantic interview is fascinating, if not for the ballyhooed reasons. Hillary Clinton has provocative things to say about U.S. foreign policy — some alarming, and others more about political positioning than anything else.

Come 2016, there will be plenty of time to discuss them.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Labor cool on Clinton”

By Alexandra Jaffe

August 20, 2014, 11:47 a.m. EDT

A top AFL-CIO official said labor is still withholding judgment on Hillary Clinton’s potential presidential candidacy, but that the movement plans to be more unified behind a candidate in 2016 than they were in 2008.

AFL-CIO Political Director Mike Podhorzer on Wednesday pushed back against the suggestion that workers have “concerns” with Clinton, but said the verdict’s still out on the former secretary of State and current frontrunner for the Democratic nomination.

“I don’t know that there are concerns,” he told reporters during a briefing at the union’s headquarters in Washington, D.C.. “People want to see where she’ll be on working family issues, if she decides to run.”

Clinton has faced skepticism among progressives who believe she may be too cozy with Wall Street and who are wary of her commitment to populist economic policies and priorities. Podhorzer said labor will be watching to see how Clinton tackles those issues.

“I think that she has, over the last six years, been really focused on foreign policy, and it remains to be seen how she’s going to campaign [on our issues] if she runs,” he said.

During the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, the nation’s major unions were split, with Clinton picking up the backing of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Union, the American Federation of Teachers and the United Farm Workers, among others, while then-Sen. Barack Obama took the endorsements of the Service Employees International Union, Teamsters and Unite Here, which represents hotel and restaurant workers.

In July, during the AFL-CIO’s executive counsel meeting, the group codified a process by which to interview and vote on a candidate in 2016, which Podhorzer said they hope will make labor “more unified” behind a single candidate.

Though Clinton's the prohibitive frontrunner for the nomination if she runs, most observers expect her to face a challenge in the primary. Arguably the top pick to take on Clinton for progressives is Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Elizabeth Warren, but the senator has repeatedly insisted she has no plans to run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Warren received a hero's welcome when she spoke at the AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington in May. Asked whether labor would like any potential candidates in particular to enter the race, Podhorzer said "wouldn't say that there's anybody in particular that has indicated an interest in running that I'm at liberty to talk about."

But he also said Warren was met with such a positive response from the labor movement because "she was embodying the principles" of the movement.

AL.com: "Another Clinton in the White House? No way, says head of Alabama's Republican Party"

By Leada Gore

August 20, 2014, 11:46 a.m. EDT

For the chairman of the Alabama GOP, one Clinton in the White House is more than enough.

Writing on the Alabama Republican Party's blog this week, Chairman Bill Armistead took direct aim at former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who is considered the overwhelming front runner among Democrats hoping to succeed President Barack Obama. Hillary Clinton spent eight years as the nation's first lady during her husband Bill Clinton's two presidential terms from 1993 to 2001.

"Hillary Clinton is trying to get her footing for a presidential run in 2016, but she's not off to a really great start. The woman who once served as Secretary of State in President Obama's inner circle is now making, what many call, failed attempts to highlight their 'fundamental differences'."

Armistead's comments come following a much-publicized interview Clinton did with The Atlantic, in which she said appeared to criticize the Obama administration's foreign policy.

"Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," Clinton said during the interview.

What Hillary Clinton needs to do to win 2016? Armistead answers

"If Hillary wants to win in 2016, she needs to turn her game on," Armistead said, pointing in particular to comments made during a nationwide tour to promote her book, "Hard Choices."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Hillary caused outrage by claiming that she and former President Bill Clinton left the White House in 2001 "dead broke" and in debt. What an absurd statement; it was public knowledge that she had signed a book deal with an advance of $8 million before leaving the White House. Who among us can get the $250,000 a pop for speaking engagements as Hillary does?" Armistead said.

Armistead said Clinton has seen a 10 point drop in her approval rating in the last few months, and said "voters are increasingly stating they would prefer a Republican president in 2016."

"One thing we can take from recent events is sure: the Democratic Party is having a difficult time. The layers of wool the Obama and Hillary have been pulling over Democrats' eyes for years are finally starting to fall away," Armistead said. "Continued tension and eventual fighting within their party will serve as yet another step toward Republican victory in the 2016 presidential election."

Hollywood Reporter: 'SNL' Political Secrets Revealed: Hillary's "Entitlement," the Sketch Obama Killed and the Show's "Karl Rove"

By Tom Shales and James Miller

August 20, 2014 3:00 a.m. PST

[Subtitle:] In an exclusive book excerpt, Tina Fey, Amy Poehler and even Sarah Palin recount the inner battle between the left and right

This story first appeared in the Aug. 29 issue of The Hollywood Reporter magazine.

From Chevy Chase's bumbling commander in chief to Tina Fey's dim-witted veep wannabe, political satire always has been a part of Saturday Night Live. And over its 39 seasons, actual politicians have clamored to be in on the joke. President Ford, running for a second term against a peanut farmer named Jimmy Carter, appeared on the show's very first season, in April 1976, to deliver the cold open ("Live from New York, it's Saturday night!"). Since then, presidents, first ladies and candidates of all stripes have made campaign stops at Studio 8H.

For a time, after 9/11, the cast and writers gave politics a rest. As Amy Poehler recalls, "The news was so bad [we] could barely do anything political." But political humor made a roaring comeback with the 2008 election. That political cycle's most bizarre media meta-moment had to have been Sarah Palin appearing on SNL on Oct. 18, 2008, alongside Fey impersonating Palin (the segment helped the show draw its largest audience in 14 years with 14 million viewers).

A new edition of the classic Saturday Night Live oral history, Live From New York, by Pulitzer Prize-winning Washington Post television critic Tom Shales and his collaborator James Miller (on sale Sept. 9), adds 200 pages of new material to the original 2002 book, updating the story through the 2000s. THR's exclusive excerpt reveals some of the behind-the-scenes battles and backstage shenanigans that shaped the political landscape of the past decade — including how presidential candidate Hillary Clinton made a last-minute decision in 2007 to cancel her SNL appearance, opening the door for a certain senator from Illinois to take her place — and even influenced the outcome of presidential campaigns.

— Andy Lewis

I. The 2008 election

Lorne Michaels, executive producer: We were contacted by, I think, Howard Wolfson from Hillary [Clinton's] campaign, and they wanted to do the first show of the season. [Barack] Obama was heating up, but they called first, so I said OK. You have to play by those rules. And then, the week of, they bailed. I went, "Really? You called us, and we gave it to you." I think every now and then I get carried away and think we actually do have influence. And then, after that, we put Obama on the date when Hillary was supposed to be on. The sense of entitlement which was following her everywhere at that point peaked for me at the bailing.

Tina Fey, castmember: It was August of 2008, and I was on Fire Island with my husband, Jeff, and it was funny because he had the cover of the Times that said, "McCain Picks Running Mate," and he said he thought there was a resemblance. I said: "I don't think so. It's just brown hair and glasses." But when we got back to the city, some cousins and old classmates were all saying, "That lady looks like you." I was sort of — arrogantly, in my own mind — resisting it, like, "I don't want to play that, and I don't know who's gonna write it, and what if I don't like what they wrote, people are going to think that I wrote it." And at some point, I realized that, like, "Oh, by the way, no one at SNL has actually asked me to do this."

Michaels: Right after the [vice presidential] debate [in October 2008], I'm coming out of my building the next day, and my doorman, Frank, says: "Mr. Michaels, what a gift! Did you see it last night? It's Tina Fey!" And I go, "No, Frank, she's not on the show anymore." And I'm literally 30 feet away from my apartment, and Bobby De Niro's there with his daughter, and he goes, "What a gift." I called Tina and said, "I think the audience is demanding that you do it."

Seth Meyers, head writer-castmember: The "Russia from the house" line? That was not [in the] first draft. I believe I'm going to give credit to [writer] Mike Shoemaker for that line. That was the thing about those sketches — you were constantly carrying them around and reading through them for whoever you could get to listen, and people would just constantly pitch jokes.

Michaels: You could see perception changing completely. It's [Jon] Lovitz as [Michael] Dukakis going, "I can't believe I'm losing to this guy." Or Chevy [Chase] as Gerald Ford going, "I was told there would be no math." The audience that was suddenly watching Sarah Palin wasn't necessarily the SNL audience. Tina crossed over. It made her a huge star.

Sarah Palin, guest: I think SNL is egotistical if they believe that it was truly an effect on maybe the public debate about who should lead the country in the next four years.

Amy Poehler, castmember: Playing Hillary and Sarah Palin was an indication of women taking center stage in politics in a way that I hadn't been able to experience in my time there. My first show was two weeks after 9/11 happened, and for the first three or four years of my time there, we could barely do anything political. Everyone and everything was so tender, and we had lost Will Ferrell as our [George W.] Bush. Everything was so bad; the news was so bad. There was a lot of pop-culture stuff, and getting to finally do really deep political parody at the end of my career there felt really satisfying.

Michaels: I called Alec [Baldwin] to come in for [Palin's appearance on Oct. 18, 2008], to be standing with me, because he was the most emblematic liberal at that point. He said he had to introduce a documentary at the Hamptons Film Festival on that Saturday, so he wouldn't be able to do it. So I said, "Alec, your instincts are always great, but are you telling me you're not going to be here for this thing that the whole world is waiting to see?"

Fey: I was the one pitching, "Why don't you start her backstage, you know, with Alec, so the crowd won't boo." She had just been booed at a hockey game in Philadelphia, and I thought we had to be cautious. And of course the audience was just happy to see her because she was a star, a media star. Even the New York audience was not feeling their politics at that moment.

Michaels: Tina was terrified of anything where they would be together looking like an endorsement.

Palin: I know that they portrayed me as an idiot, and I hated that, and I wanted to come on the show and counter some of that.

Michaels: [Palin] has wonderful manners — and I honestly don't mean this in a condescending way — but it's that pageant-winner thing.

Palin: If I ran into Tina Fey again today, I would say: "You need to at least pay for my kids' braces or something from all the money that you made off of pretending that you're me! My goodness, you capitalized on that! Can't you contribute a little bit? Jeez!"

II. The impersonations

Bill Hader, castmember: I remember Seth Meyers very clearly coming up to me and saying: "[Writer-producer James] Downey just wrote a cold open where you play Eliot Spitzer. Do you have an Eliot Spitzer?" And I said, "Who's Eliot Spitzer?" And Seth is like: "You're an idiot. One, he was our governor." I know nothing. So it was like, "Go watch this tape, watch him give this speech and figure this out, you dummy." And then I would figure it out, and I learned I was a pretty quick study at this stuff.

Horatio Sanz, castmember: I always kind of felt bad when Will Ferrell did his Bush impression because he was such a good old boy that you really didn't think, "Oh, this evil little rich prick whose dad and his friends got him in office." You thought, "Oh, he's just a good old guy I'd like to drink beer with." As funny as Will's impression was, the audience as a whole, the whole country, would probably see that as, "Oh, I like Bush. Because he's Will." You know, if Will hadn't done that impression, or at least made him likable, it may have tipped it the other way. I honestly think so. We made up for it. I think Tina's impression basically killed Sarah Palin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Will Forte, castmember: I did not want to do Bush. I'm not an impersonator. Those presidential election periods and those great debates that I'd seen over the years were a really special thing about the show, but I felt like I was part of the one period that might not have been so great just because I didn't think that I was that good. It's a shame because Seth Meyers did a great John Kerry; he would hold up his end of the deal, but I just didn't give him anything great to play off of. It was also hard because Will Ferrell was so good at it. It was almost like somebody coming in and taking over the role of Church Lady. That's Dana Carvey; nobody else can do Church Lady. And that's kind of what it felt like with George Bush. You can't retire George Bush because somebody's gotta be him.

Will Ferrell, castmember: I get asked in a press junket, "Do you have a good Obama up your sleeve?" and I'm like, "No." Once I left the show, I stopped trying to think of political impressions. But also, Obama is difficult. He's very dry and subtle. And yet you see Jay [Pharoah], and the people get it down, and you're like, "Oh, there's the impression."

James Downey, producer-writer: If I had to describe Obama as a comedy project, I would say, "Degree of difficulty, 10 point 10." It's like being a rock climber looking up at a thousand-foot-high face of solid obsidian, polished and oiled. There's not a single thing to grab onto — certainly not a flaw or hook that you can caricature. [Al] Gore had these "handles," so did Bush, and Sarah Palin, and even Hillary had them. But with Obama, it was the phenomenon — less about him and more about the effect he had on other people and the way he changed their behavior. So that's the way I wrote him.

Fred Armisen, castmember: My approach to everything in life is, "Sure, I'll give it a try." I knew they were looking for an Obama, so when Lorne called me into his office and [producer] Marci Klein said, "Let Fred do it," and Lorne was like, "Would you want to try it?," I was just like, "OK, I'll give it a try." They asked me on a Tuesday, and I think I did it thatSaturday. I bought Obama's book on iTunes, and I watched videos.

Jay Pharoah, castmember: I did an event at Harvey Weinstein's house — very nice; I'd never been there. I was trying to take my makeup off because I was [Obama] at this event, and [Obama] stood right there watching me do it. He was laughing; it was so petrifying. As long as there's no beef between me and the president, that's good. When that happens, you're Kanye West.

Paula Pell, writer: I planned that I was going to come up and talk to [Palin] and shake her hand and welcome her and say, "My wife and I are very good people, and we live a very socially conscious life, and we do a lot for our community, and I just want you to know the face of gay couples and gay people," and I had this whole speech planned. Then I just kind of came up to her in the chaos in the hallway and just nodded and said "hi" and walked off. I thought to myself, "I'm such a chickenshit." I was like, "Wow, she's pretty." I just got overwhelmed by the fact that this character who was everywhere on TV was in front of me, and she was real and just ridiculous. So I didn't get my big political moment.

III. The (office) politics

Downey: The biggest risk to doing political comedy is, you always seem to have a choice: Am I going to piss off the audience by trying to get them to laugh when they don't like what I'm saying, or am I going to kiss their ass and get this tremendous wind at my back by sucking up to them? The second way makes me feel like I cheated. I'm sure there are a lot of people in comedy who completely share every f—ing detail, jot and tittle of the Obama administration agenda, and all I can say is: To the extent that you're sincere and that's really the way you feel, then you're a very lucky person because, guess what, you're going to have a very easy career in comedy because audiences will always applaud. They may not laugh, but they'll always give you [a] huge ovation. That's Bill Maher, you know?

Robert Smigel, writer: It wasn't until my last season that the network refused to air a "TV Funhouse." It was a live-action one that was meant to be about racism and profiling, an airline-safety video with multilingual narration, and whenever you heard a different language, they would cut to people of that nationality. First, typical white Americans, then a Latino family, then a Japanese family, all being instructed about seat belts, overhead compartments, et cetera. Then it cuts to an Arab man, and the narrator says, in Arabic, "During the flight, please do not blow up the airplane. The United States is actually a humanitarian nation that is rooted in the concept of freedom," and so on. … When the standards people freaked, Lorne fought them. Standards pushed back hard. They even got someone at NBC human resources to condemn it. … Lorne said, "I have a plan." Obama was doing a cameo in the cold open. Lorne told me he would show my sketch to Obama. "If Obama thinks it's OK, they won't be able to argue it." I thought it was a brilliant idea, except why would Obama ever give this thing his blessing? What if word got out? "Hey, everybody, that guy over there said it was cool. The one running for president of the country." But I loved Lorne for caring this much and being willing to go that far to get this thing on TV.

Michaels: Obama said, "It's funny, but no, I don't think so."

Downey: There was one Bush piece I did a couple times in dress that I think died twice and was never on. It was after Abu Ghraib. I knew I was in very dangerous comedy territory, and it was a piece where Bush was trying to justify Abu Ghraib. He was addressing the nation and saying it was an attempt, maybe awkward on our part, to make Iraqis more comfortable with their bodies. There was something about the joy of the nudist lifestyle, and I remember at one point it had a joke like, "Many people have objected to the fact that the detainees were forced to mime sex acts. Now, is it the fact that it was sex acts that you find offensive or is it that it was homosexual sex acts? Think about that, then tell me who's in the wrong here." I thought it was funny. It was a desperate attempt to turn the tables on critics. When we did the sketch [in dress rehearsal], it was like a death camp in there; the audience was like, "No." There's not laughing, and then there's aggressive silence.

Sanz: I don't think the show itself has ever let its freak flag fly in the last 20 years. Lorne's very concerned with being neutral so he wants to make fun of everyone. … He doesn't want the show to be this liberal bash rag. He may be a little more conservative than he lets on. … And you also have Jim Downey, who's basically the Karl Rove of SNL. He's always writing the right wing sketches, and honestly I think a lot of times they're out of tune with the audience. … I think Lorne sometimes leans too much on Downey and not enough on guys like Seth. Basically in the last couple of years, it's been Seth going up against Downey to set the show's tone on politics, and I think we could definitely have been harder on the right. They deserved it, and we dropped the ball as far as getting them.

Downey: My mission is to try to write a funny piece using politics as the subject matter, and so I go with what I think is the most interesting, potentially funny idea that no one else is talking about.

Sanz: The week that Nancy Pelosi was made speaker, the only thing that we could come up with at the time was, because she was from San Francisco, to make her a dominatrix. I thought that was really, really cheap. … It was pretty frustrating. And it continues to be frustrating. I don't really like watching the political scenes that much anymore because they're not written in the writers' and actors' tone. They're written like Downey wants to put this message out. And I think that's kind of shitty.

Downey: I used to write this stuff with Al Franken when we started out; I was a standard-issue Harvard graduate commie, and Al was like a Democratic Party stalwart. I had contempt for the partisan stuff. And I became more conservative over the years, to the point where I'm now a conservative Democrat, which means in Hollywood terms I'm a McCarthyite, I suppose. But I have to say, and even Franken agrees with me — I've talked to him about this — that the last couple seasons of the show were the only two in the show's history where we were totally like every other comedy show: basically, an arm of the Hollywood Democratic establishment. [Jon] Stewart was more nuanced. We just stopped doing anything which could even be misinterpreted as a criticism of Obama.

Smigel: My last cartoon, in February 2008, was "The Obama Files" — about candidate Obama's efforts to distance himself from Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton without alienating them. It turned out that on the same show, Hillary Clinton made a cameo in the cold open. She was planning to leave right after, but Lorne liked the cartoon and asked her to hang around for 20 more minutes and watch it. She was laughing a lot at the cartoon. Then about halfway in, I remembered that the ending might not be as much fun. It had Sharpton and Jackson falling through a trapdoor and landing in a "community van" with other political liabilities, including Bill Clinton, who then asks the driver to head for spring break. Relatively tame, but still it's her husband. Fortunately, Poehler walked in just before then. Hillary still saw it and chuckled politely, but her focus was split and awkwardness was averted. Later, I saw Lorne, and the first thing out of his mouth was, "I forgot about the Bill part." I assure you, the fact that it was my last cartoon is a total coincidence.

Weekly Standard blog: The Blog: “Liz Warren Won't Say Hillary Is Best Choice for 2016”

Elizabeth Warren, the popular Democratic senator from Massachusetts, declined an opportunity to say whether Hillary Clinton is the best choice to be president in 2016:

[VIDEO]

A reporter asked, "Do you believe that Hillary Clinton is still the best choice coming up for your party coming up for 2016?"

"Hillary is terrific," Warren said, dodging the question.

"But is she still the best choice?" the reporter pressed.

Warren "dodged" says the anchor, noting that she left reporters without ever answering the question.

New York Times column: Thomas L. Friedman: “Will the Ends, Will the Means”

By Thomas L. Friedman

August 19, 2014

Hillary Clinton recently reignited the who-lost-Syria debate when she suggested that President Obama made a mistake in not intervening more forcefully early in the Syrian civil war by arming the pro-democracy rebels. I’ve been skeptical about such an intervention — skeptical that there were enough of these “mainstream insurgents,” skeptical that they could ever defeat President Bashar al-Assad’s army and the Islamists and govern Syria. So if people try to sell you on it, ask them these questions before you decide if you are with Clinton or Obama:

1. Can they name the current leader of the Syrian National Coalition, the secular, moderate opposition, and the first three principles of its political platform? Extra credit if they can name the last year that the leader of the S.N.C. resided in Syria. Hint: It’s several decades ago.

2. Can they explain why Israel — a country next door to Syria that has better intelligence on Syria than anyone and could be as affected by the outcome there as anyone — has chosen not to bet on the secular, moderate Syrian rebels or arm them enough to topple Assad?

3. The United States invaded Iraq with more than 100,000 troops, replaced its government with a new one, suppressed its Islamist extremists and trained a “moderate” Iraqi army, but, the minute we left, Iraq’s “moderate” prime minister turned sectarian. Yet, in Syria, Iraq’s twin, we’re supposed to believe that the moderate insurgents could have toppled Assad and governed Syria without any American boots on the ground, only arming the good rebels. Really?

4. How could the good Syrian rebels have triumphed in Syria when the main funders of so many rebel groups there — Qatar and Saudi Arabia — are Sunni fundamentalist monarchies that oppose the very sort of democratic, pluralistic politics in their own countries that the decent Syrian rebels aspire to build in Syria?

5. Even if we had armed Syrian moderates, how could they have defeated a coalition of the Syrian Alawite army and gangs, backed by Russia, backed by Iran, backed by Hezbollah — all of whom play by “Hama Rules,” which are no rules at all — without the U.S. having to get involved?

6. How is it that some 15,000 Muslim men from across the Muslim world have traveled to Syria to fight for jihadism and none have walked there to fight for pluralism, yet the Syrian moderates would not only have been able to defeat the Assad regime — had we only armed them properly — but also this entire jihadist foreign legion?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The notion that the only reason that the Islamist militias emerged in Syria is because we created a vacuum by not adequately arming the secular rebels is laughable nonsense. Syria has long had its own Sunni fundamentalist underground. In 1982, when then President Hafez al-Assad perpetrated the Hama massacre, it was in an effort to wipe out those Syrian Islamists. So, yes, there are cultural roots for pluralism in Syria — a country with many Christians and secular Muslims — but there's also the opposite. Do not kid yourself.

That is why on a brief visit to Darkush, Syria, in December 2012, I was told by the local Free Syrian Army commander, Muatasim Bila Abul Fida, that even after Assad's regime is toppled there would be another war in Syria: "It will take five or six years," he added, because the Islamist parties "want Shariah, and we want democracy." There were always going to be two civil wars there: The liberals and jihadists against Assad and the liberals and jihadists against each other.

Don't get me wrong. My heart is with the brave Syrian liberals who dared to take to the streets and demand regime change — unarmed. These are decent, good people, the kind you would like to see running Syria. But it would take a lot more than better arms for them to defeat Assad and the jihadists.

Here Iraq is instructive. You need to go back to the 2010 elections there when Ayad Allawi, a secular Shiite, who ran with Sunnis, Shiites and Christians on a moderate, pluralistic platform — like Syria's moderates — actually won more seats than his main competitor, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

What enabled that? I'll tell you: The U.S. decapitated Saddam's regime, then helped to midwife an Iraqi Constitution and elections, while U.S. (and Iraqi) special forces either arrested or killed the worst Sunni and Shiite extremists. We took out both extremes without reading them their Miranda rights. That is what gave Iraq's moderate center the space, confidence and ability to back multisectarian parties, which is what many Iraqis wanted. When our troops left, though, that center couldn't hold.

I don't want U.S. troops in Syria any more than anyone else, but I have no respect for the argument that just arming some pro-democracy rebels would have gotten the job done. Yes, there has been a price for Obama's inaction. But there is a price for effective action as well, which the critics have to be honest about. It's called an international force. We are dealing not only with states that have disintegrated, but whole societies — and rebuilding them is the mother of all nation-building projects. Will the ends, will the means. Otherwise, you're not being serious.

I understand what we're trying to do with "common ground, " elaboration but I really feel like breaking up a very tight line that summarizes her approach weakens it pretty completely.

So at the 3rd graph on p. 3, I would deliver the line first followed by the riff below and then bridge to immigration:

"That's what I'll do as President. I know how to find common ground and I know when to stand my ground. I will go anywhere, talk with anyone and work my heart out to improve your lives, your families' lives, your children's lives.

That's what I've been doing for decades. That's how I helped create the Children's Health insurance Program when I was First Lady and today the covers more than 8 million kids. That's how as a Senator I won health benefits for heroic first responders who rushed into the trade center on that horrible day and faced lingering health issues. That's how I helped secure a landmark treaty with Russia to reduce the threat from nuclear weapons when I was secretary of state. So I know how to find common ground to get things done.

But I also know when to stand my ground especially when it comes to those powerful interests who are acting against the interest of hard working Americans and their families and holding you back from getting ahead. I will stand my ground to stop drug companies from price gouging and charging you more for the drugs you need to stay healthy than they do in other countries.

I will stand my ground against polluters, who want to keep dumping their carbon pollution into the air you breathe and causing the climate change that threatens our planet and puts our children's and grandchildren's future at risk.

I will stand my ground against the corporate gun lobby who fight every common sense gun law we need, including keeping guns out of the hands of the mentally ill or suspected terrorists on the no-fly list.

I will continue to stand my ground and speak out loudly against those raising their voices in preaching some of the most hateful intolerance towards immigrants , towards Muslims, towards LGBT Americans.

THEN GO INTO THE IMMIGRATION SECITON WITH A SMOOTH TRANSITION.

Hey all! I agree with all of Emmy's suggestions.

It would also be great to thank NV State Democratic Party Chairwoman Roberta Lange. I think this can be done in a brief line at the very beginning.

Additionally, if she could mention that she is grateful to have the support of many of the state legislators in the room tonight because they understand what's at stake. They saw firsthand during the 2015 Legislative Session what happens when Republicans get in control and what that means for Nevada families. "Their fights are my fights, and I'm grateful they have my back." ...or something much more articulate and eloquent than that.

I think that will score us bonus points with the political leaders and the base. Thanks!

- Also, all over Nevada people reference her trips to this state even before she ran for President, for example in the early 2000s to visit Fallon's Leukemia bubble. Would love to find a way to incorporate her Nevada roots and how much she loves this state, her history here.

Thanks so much for your work on this.

Subject: HRC's record

John: Re our previous exchange of e-mails, I have taken the 25 pages of Chapter 3 of "Hard Choices" and boiled them down to 2 pages which surrogates hopefully could use when talking about HRC's record. Please be frank and let me know whether it would be useful to do the same with the rest of the book. If it is not useful, please say so...it will save me a lot of time doing the rest of the book. Warmest regards. Les Hyman

ASIA: THE PIVOT

Upon becoming Secretary of State, HRC broke precedent by focusing initially on the AsiaPacific region that is home to more than half the world's population, including several of our most trusted allies and valuable trading partners. She made her first trip as Secretary to Japan, then on to Indonesia, South Korea and finally China in order to send a message to Asia and the world that America was back.

HRC believed that the U.S. should be doing more to manage our increasingly complex relationship with China. Her goal was a sophisticated strategy that encouraged China to participate as a responsible member of the international community, while standing firm in defense of our values and interests.

Her initial task was to reassert America as a Pacific power without sparking an unnecessary confrontation with China. While previously American attention had focused on Northeast Asia because of our troop commitments in Japan and South Korea, countries like Indonesia, Malaysia, and Vietnam were growing in economic and strategic importance but were not receiving the attention of the U.S. so HRC went there.

HRC's unique methodology was to get out beyond Foreign Ministries and palaces and instead meet with citizens, especially community activists and volunteers; journalists; students and professors; business, labor and religious leaders, all part of the civil societies that help hold governments accountable and drive social change. HRC's many meetings with civil societies in the Asia-Pacific area, many of which previously had been ignored, made countless friends for the United States.

No previous U.S. Secretary of State ever had visited the headquarters of ASEAN (the Association of Southeast Asian Nations) located in Jakarta (Indonesia). HRC was the first. Previous American officials had skipped ASEAN conferences which some saw as a sign of America's flagging presence in the Asia-Pacific, even as China was seeking to expand its influence. After HRC went to the ASEAN headquarters, the Secretary-General of ASEAN said about HRC: "Your visit shows the seriousness of the United States to end its diplomatic absenteeism in the region".

In her visit to South Korea, a wealthy and advanced democracy, and in meetings with President Lee Myung-bak, HRC restated the commitment of the U.S. to that country which lived in the shadow of North Korea, a repressive and bellicose neighbor to the north.

In March of 2009, a crew of American TV journalists were reporting from the border between China and North Korea. Two of the women reporters were arrested and dragged back to North Korea where they were sentenced to 12 years of hard labor. HRS spent hours on the phone with leaders in Beijing, Moscow, Tokyo and other capitals drumming up support for a strong UN resolution imposing sanctions on the regime in Pyongyang. Her efforts paid off when all the members of the UN Security Council agreed to impose additional sanctions on North Korea (the toughest measure ever imposed on that country). They resulted in Kim Il -Sung saying that he would release the women journalists if he received a personal visit from Bill Clinton. Many in the White House opposed sending the former President, but HRC convinced President Obama to do what was necessary to rescue the two innocent American civilians. Clinton went, and In 20 hours the American journalists were released.

Another part of HRC's strategy was to bring India more fully into the Asian-Pacific political scene. Having another large democracy with a full seat at the table in the region could help encourage more countries to move toward political and economic openness, rather than follow China's example of autocratic state capitalism.

As an example of her strategy, HRC traveled to the Indian port city of Chennai on the Bay of Bengal, a commercial hub that looks out toward the vibrant trade and energy routes of Southeast Asia. She wanted to show that the U.S. understood that India was more than Delhi and Mumbai. She spoke about India's role in the Asia-Pacific region, stating that the strategic fundamentals of our relationship with India -- shared democratic values, economic imperatives, and diplomatic priorities -- were pushing both countries' interests into closer convergence.

While China's rise and its mix of authoritarianism and state capitalism offered an attractive example to some Asian countries, HRC cited many counterexamples to disprove those theories, to wit: Japan, Malaysia, South Korea, Indonesia and Taiwan were all democratic societies that delivered tremendous economic benefits to their people.

In July of 2012, HRC took an extended tour across the Asian-Pacific region to emphasize that democracy and prosperity go hand in hand. She started in Japan, one of the strongest and richest democracies in the world, and then visited Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos where she became the first Secretary of State to step foot in that country in fifty-seven years.

A major goal of U.S. strategy in Asia was to promote political reform as well as economic growth. Everywhere Secretary Clinton went she pledged that the United States would be a strong partner to all those across Asia and the world who were dedicated to human rights and fundamental freedoms. A Washington Post editorial declared that HRC's speech had offered "hope that the U.S. pivot to Asia will go beyond simple muscle-flexing and become a multi-layered approach to match the complexity of China's rise as a modern superpower."

Subject:	FOR REVIEW - Sanders Tar Sands
Attachments:	20151029 Bernies Pipeline Hypocrisy.docx

Friends,

h/t to Tyson – here is more information on the tar sands hit I mentioned in my email yesterday. It is not as cut and dried since Sanders did sign a letter looking into this, but he is not outspoken on this issue at all despite Vermont environmentalists asking him to be. This may be something we want to talk to Jeanne Shaheen about since she has been more outspoken and more recently. Below is the summary and attached is the doc.

Bernie Sanders has long bragged that he opposed the Keystone Pipeline for years, calling it an "easy" decision to make. But he has been conspicuously more restrained when it comes to a pipeline between Quebec and Maine, crossing Vermont and New Hampshire.

In 2008, the oil company Enbridge filed plans to reverse the flow of the Portland to Montreal pipeline, so it could carry oil from Canada to Maine for export. This pipeline is connected to a much longer pipeline in Western Canada, the source of much tar sand oil.

In 2013, Enbridge renewed plans to reverse the flow of just the Canadian pipeline, in order to bring heavy crude from Alberta to Quebec refineries. American environmentalists became concerned this was the first step of a plan to eventually reverse the Portland to Montreal pipeline to bring tar sand oil across the border for export from Maine. 18 members of Congress, including Sanders, signed a letter to Secretary of State Kerry calling for a presidential permit and an environmental review before that could occur.

However, Sanders has not spoken about the pipeline since then. In 2014, the Canadian government gave initial approval to reverse an Enbridge pipeline to bring tar sands oil from Alberta to Quebec. The Maine and New Hampshire Congressional delegations wrote to Secretary Kerry again in concern. But even though Vermont environmental groups called out Sanders and members of their delegations by name, it does not appear they issued a statement or criticized the Canadian decision.

In October 2015, the Canadian government gave final approval to the plan to reverse the pipeline, with no outcry from Sanders. Although Enbridge claims it has no plan to transport heavy crude across the border, his restraint on this issue compared to Keystone is notable considering the Enbridge plan could affect his home state of Vermont.

Subject: PLS REVIEW: Sanders Hits

Hi everyone,

I wanted to us all on a single thread since this document could serve multiple purposes. Attached are some hits that could either be written or deployed during the next debate on Sanders. Note: these do not include the college and $20 trillion cost of his plans since Policy is working on them. Below is a quick summary of the hits that are in the document. It might be having a call soon to discuss if people think it's worth it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Per HRC's request, we are doing a deeper dive on Sanders's agriculture record to see if there is anything that could be problematic to Iowa.

(As always, huge credit to the team for their help building these out.)

> Also: Tyson has been working on building out Sanders's muted response to possible tar sand oil traveling through a pipeline that goes through Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont. He found one letter he signed calling for an environmental study, something Shaheen did as well. So, while he could point to that, his outrage over potential tar sands in this pipeline is nowhere near his opposition to the Keystone Pipeline. We can send around more details once it's done, but wanted to put that on the radar.

SUMMARY

Labor/Pay to Play/Sugar - Sanders, often thought of as a champion of labor unions, accepted support from a company while it was involved in a bitter labor dispute—locking out union employees for nearly 22 months. In July 2012, he accepted $10,000 in contributions from American Crystal Sugar, while the workers had been locked out for nearly a year due to failed labor negotiations. The workers' union widely opposed the company's contract proposal because it could have doubled their out-of-pocket health care costs. At the same time American Crystal Sugar was proposing to cut back on workers' health benefits, it spent more than $2 million in lobbying money and campaign contributions to politicians like Sanders in order to preserve its favorable sugar commodity program. Sanders voted to protect the sugar program.

Crime Bill –Bernie Sanders's Presidential Campaign claimed it was researching statements made by Hillary Clinton in support of the 1994 crime bill in order to attack her in the Democratic Primary. But Sanders voted in support of the bill in 1994, and repeatedly spoke in support of it. Then Rep. Sanders criticized opposition to the bill and hoped President Clinton would be able to pass it. Furthermore, in his 2006 campaign for Senate, Sanders' campaign strongly highlighted Sanders support for the 1994 crime bill. His campaign boasted of the billions Sanders had provided to law enforcement since being elected, and used his support of the 1994 crime bill to prove Sanders was "tough on crime."

Guns - Sen. Sanders's progressive bona fides are called into question with his record on reducing gun violence. When he successfully ran for the House in 1990, he got the tacit endorsement of the NRA after pledging not to support the Brady Bill, which included waiting periods to receive weapons. Once in the House, he kept his word, voting against the legislation five times. Although he voted against the bill, he voted for an amendment that created the so-called "Charleston loophole," which allows people to purchase a weapon after three days even if their background check is incomplete. Later, Sanders, despite wanting to hold essentially every corporation accountable for something (such as fast food companies accountable for obesity), voted to protect gun manufacturers from legal liability. He also voted to strip millions from gun research, something the NRA has wanted to prevent officials from learning about gun violence. (NOTE: This doesn't include the guns from Vermont to New York)

LGBT (Marriage & Civil Unions) - Sen. Sanders is attacking Secretary Clinton, claiming she has been inconsistent and late to supporting marriage equality. But Sanders is rewriting history on his own record. In 2000, Sanders was reluctant to take a clear stand on civil unions and marriage equality, and did not speak out forcefully on the issue. Sanders called for an end to the divisiveness of the opposition, saying there were "a dozen other issues out there that are as important or more important as that issue." While other Vermont politicians were moving forward the cause, Sanders remained relatively quiet. Moreover, his oft-touted opposition to the Defense of Marriage Act omits Sanders's reasoning: he thought DOMA injected the federal government into a states issue.

Repealing Obamacare & Replacing it with State-Run Single Payer - Sen. Sanders has long advocated for a single payer, Medicare-for-all health plan that is administered by the states. His plan would repeal the Affordable Care Act, as well as Medicare, TRICARE, Medicaid, and SCHIP. His proposal would cost roughly $15 trillion. Vermont tried to implement a single payer plan but scrapped it because it would cost too much.

Wall Street (Commodities Futures Modernization Act) - Sen. Sanders repeatedly touts his opposition to the repeal of Glass-Steagall. What he fails to mention is that he voted for the legislation that included the Commodities Futures Modernization Act, signed into law by President Clinton. The Act exempted regulation of credit default swaps and derivatives. Sanders himself blamed the CFMA for Lehman's bankruptcy. Sanders's spokesperson said he voted for the bill because it was part of a larger bill that would have shut down the government had it not passed.

Ethanol - Sanders has voted to end ethanol subsidies. He hedged his answer on the Renewable Fuel Standard including ethanol earlier in 2015, but has subsequently come out in support.

Export-Import Bank - Sanders is a long critic of the Export-Import bank, calling it corporate welfare. However, roughly 3,000 small businesses rely on loans from the bank.

Nuclear Energy - Sanders voted for a waste removal compact that moved radioactive waste from Maine and Vermont to a dump site near a tiny community in Sierra Blanca, Texas. Sanders said the compact was "good environmental policy" and said he was "in strong support of the bill." Critics of the deal said that the site was not only environmentally unsound, but also near a small community that was low income and largely Hispanic. The compact was opposed by LULAC and the NAACP, and a local opponent to the deal called it "environmental racism."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NOTE: President Clinton signed the bill in 1997.

Immigration - Sanders's record on immigration is mixed. While he voted for the 2013 comprehensive bill, he opposed the McCain-Kennedy comprehensive bill. Sanders's objection was over guest worker program which he said drove down wages for American workers. As recent as this summer, Sanders used similar language about low-skill (and even high-skill) immigrants drive down wages for American citizens. Immigration advocates criticized him for those comments.

Sanders Not Straight on His Tax Plan - Sen. Sanders has not told the American people how much he is going to raise taxes and who is going to pay for them. When confronted on details of his tax plan, he simply says "it's coming." When he is asked what the highest rate would be, he demurs.

Sanders Not Straight on His Spending - Sen. Sanders has not told the American people how much his plans will cost and how he will pay for them. When asked for specifics, he demurs. When other estimates show trillions in new spending, he simply rejects them without offering his own estimate.

Barack Obama, Gene McCarthy & Change

Posted at: 2008-12-01 07:46:00.0
Author: Michael Sean Winters

As President-elect Obama begins appointing officials to his administration, the leftie blogosphere has been complaining that too many positions have gone to former Clinton officials, which they interpret as a shift to the center. And they object to it as such. But, the ideological origins of Obama's in-coming administration are more complicated than a binary choice between Clintonistas and change. The Democratic Party pre-dates the arrival of the Clintons in Washington in 1993 and some of those who have worked hardest for Obama got their political start working for Gene McCarthy back in 1968.

Gregory Craig was an early supporter of Obama even though he had worked for the Clintons as well. He is slated to become White House Counsel. Craig got his start in politics working in Nebraska on the McCarthy campaign. John Podesta, who is in charge of the transition, also got his start in politics working for McCarthy, and his brother, the uber-lobbyist Tony Podesta, had the unenviable task of organizing Gary, Indiana for McCarthy in the face of a local political establishment that was firmly in the Kennedy camp. Craig and the Podestas have been a half-step away from power or closer ever since.

In 1968, Marty Peretz became actively involved in the McCarthy campaign, raising money and giving speeches on his behalf. Peretz's daughter is even named Evgenia. In 2008, Peretz became a stalwart supporter of Obama. He again raised money and was especially helpful in persuading Jewish voters in Florida that they could trust Obama. Peretz's 1960s anti-war leftism did not survive the 1973 Yom Kippur War, but his steadfast support for Israel through the years came in handy in Florida.

Sometimes the connections from the McCarthy campaign to the Obama presidency are exceedingly dense. Both John and Tony Podesta came to Colorado in 1974 to help Sam Brown get elected State Treasurer. The three had met on the McCarthy campaign. In the Carter administration, John Podesta worked for Brown at the Action agency. This year, Brown raised more than $1 million for Obama according to a source close to the campaign's finance wing and has spent much of the past three election cycles raising money for congressional candidates while Podesta's Center for American Progress provides those same candidates with policy briefings. Brown served in the Clinton administration as ambassador to the Vienna-based Organization on Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), a position that became critical during negotiations about Bosnia and Kosovo because Russia was a member of OSCE but was not party to the multi-lateral organizations in Brussels. With Russia growing ever more menacing, look for Brown to return to Europe or land a job at Foggy Bottom.

I am sure there are others from the McCarthy campaign who remain active in the early stages of the Obama years. I am also sure there are some Democrats who came to Washington with Walter Mondale, or who found their own way here, and have risen to the ranks where they might expect an appointment. Obama is evidently going to bring some new blood with him, too, nominating Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano as Secretary of Homeland Security and installing his Chicago advisor David Axelrod as a White House counselor.

The "change or Clintonista" distinction is not just a distinction without a difference. It is a distinction that ignores one of American liberalism's finest beliefs: Provenance is the least important thing to know about a person or an idea. It is a belief

Scotland on the Eve of the Independence Referendum

On September 18th, Scottish voters will decide whether their country will be the first to secede from a Western-European state in recent history. After two years of campaigning it would seem that politicians, academics, and journalists would have a good understanding of the public sentiment. Using very recent data from the only large-scale, representative, and comprehensive attitudes surveys in Scotland, however, this talk will highlight where the general "wisdom" about Scots' attitudes towards the referendum may be empirically wrong. After showing where the polls stand and what we may expect as polling day approaches, this talk will focus in particular on how the attitudes of Scottish people towards international affairs have often been misrepresented, in particular in relation to the European Union, Scotland's role in the world, and nuclear weapons in Scotland. The talk will identify issues that may still move people, in either direction, before casting their vote.

Soviet Occupation of Romania, Hungary, and Austria 1944-1949

Soviet Occupation of Romania, Hungary, and Austria 1944/45–1948/49, Csaba Békés, László Borhi, Peter Ruggenthaler, Ottmar Trasca (Eds.) Central European University Press, Budapest – New York, 2015

This recently published book compares the various aspects – political, military, economic – of Soviet occupation in three key countries of the region: Austria, Hungary and Romania. Using documents found in Austrian, Hungarian, Romanian and Russian archives the authors argue that the nature of Soviet foreign policy has been largely misunderstood. Existing literature has mostly focused on Soviet foreign policy from a political perspective; when and why Stalin made the decision to introduce Bolshevik political systems in the Soviet sphere of influence. This book will show that the Soviet conquest of East-Central Europe had an imperial dimension as well and allowed the Soviet Union to use the territory it occupied as military and economic space. The final dimension of the book details the tragically human experiences of Soviet occupation: atrocities, rape, plundering and deportations.

By bringing key documents together in one single volume, this book offers penetrating new insights into Soviet policies in Romania, Hungary and Austria that also contributed to the origins of the Cold War.

The book will be presented by Krisztina KÓS, Director of CEU Press and three of the editors: Csaba BÉKÉS, László BORHI and Peter RUGGENTHALER.

Krisztina KÓS joined Central European University Press in 2002 after having graduated from ELTE University, Budapest. A literary scholar by training, she was editor at the Press for nine years and became the director in 2011. She is also a freelance editor and translator.

Csaba BÉKÉS, Ph.D., Doctor of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, is founding director of the Cold War History Research Center (www.coldwar.hu) and Research Chair at the Institute of Political Studies, Hungarian Academy of Sciences, both in Budapest. He is also Professor of History at Corvinus University of Budapest and a recurring visiting professor at Columbia University. [[First_Name]], There's some good news, some bad news, and more good news…

The good news: Since last week, 12,000 people signed our TV ad at WeWantThePublicOption.com and it's aired over 100 times in DC! The Washington Post reported Sunday that Democratic senators are shaken up by our pressure. And today, Sen. Kay Hagan -- named in our ad and others -- announced she'll support the public option.

The bad news: The Hill newspaper reported last night that half-a-dozen Senate Democrats still might "buck their party" and oppose the public option. And today, White House Chief of Staff Rahm Emanuel began to cave -- calling the public option "negotiable."

More good news: President Obama issued a statement from Russia today that seemed to reverse Rahm Emanuel's remarks. He said he wants a public option in the final bill.

The bottom line: This is still an all-out battle, it's changing every day, and regular people like us can continue to impact the fight.

The Washington Post reports that Senate Dems are shaken up by our TV ads. We have momentum -- but we need to continue fighting.

Can you chip in to keep our ads on the air for a second week?

Can you help keep our hard-hitting ads on TV in DC for a second week by chipping in today?

Every three donations of $50 allow one more ad on MSNBC.

We're rotating new names into the TV ad every day -- and we'll keep these ads on the air as long as public support for them keeps growing.

Thanks so much for being a bold progressive.

Full text of his speech:

Text of Marco Rubio's Announcement Speech / As Prepared for Delivery

Thank you.

After months of deliberation and prayer about the future of our country, I have come here tonight to make an announcement on how I believe I can best serve her.
I chose to make this announcement at the Freedom Tower because it is a symbol of our nation's identity as the land of opportunity. And I am more confident than ever that despite our troubles, we have it within our power to make our time another American Century.

In this very room five decades ago, tens of thousands of Cuban exiles began their new lives in America. Their story is part of the larger story of the American miracle. How, united by a common faith in their God given right to go as far as their talent and work would take them, a collection of immigrants and exiles, former slaves and refugees, became one people, and together built the freest and most prosperous nation ever.

For almost all of human history, power and wealth belonged only to a select few. Most people who have ever lived were trapped by the circumstances of their birth, destined to live the life their parents had. But America is different. Here, we are the children and grandchildren of people who refused to accept this.
Both of my parents were born to poor families in Cuba. After his mother died when he was nine, my father left school to go work. My mother was one of seven girls raised by a disabled father who struggled to provide for his family.

When they were young, my parents had big dreams for themselves. But because they were not born into wealth or power, their future was destined to be defined by their past. So in 1956 they came here, to the one place on earth where the aspirations of people like them could be more than just dreams.

My father became a bartender. My mother a cashier, a maid and a Kmart stock clerk. They never made it big. But they were successful. Two immigrants with little money or education found stable jobs, owned a home, retired with security and gave all four of their children a life far better than their own.

My parents achieved what came to be known as the American Dream. But now, too many Americans are starting to doubt whether achieving that dream is still possible:

Hard working families living paycheck to paycheck, one unexpected expense away from disaster…

Young Americans, unable to start a career, a business or a family, because they owe thousands in student loans for degrees that did not lead to jobs…

And small business owners, left to struggle under the weight of more taxes, more regulations and more government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Why is this happening in a country that for over two centuries has been defined by equality of opportunity?

Because while our people and economy are pushing the boundaries of the 21st century, too many of our leaders and their ideas are stuck in the twentieth century.

They are busy looking backward, so they do not see how jobs and prosperity today depend on our ability to compete in a global economy. So our leaders put us at a disadvantage by taxing, borrowing and regulating like it's 1999.

They look for solutions in yesterday, so they don't see that good-paying modern jobs require different skills and more education than the past. They blindly support an outdated higher education system that is too expensive and inaccessible to those who need it most.

And they have forgotten that when America fails to lead, global chaos inevitably follows, so they appease our enemies, betray our allies and weaken our military.

At the turn of the 19th century, a generation of Americans harnessed the power of the Industrial Age and transformed this country into the leading economy in the world.

And the 20th century became the American Century.

Now, the time has come for our generation to lead the way toward a new American Century.

If we reform our tax code, reduce regulations, control spending, modernize our immigration laws and repeal and replace ObamaCare, the American people will create millions of better-paying modern jobs.

If we create a 21st century system of higher education that provides working Americans the chance to acquire the skills they need, that no longer graduates students with mountains of debt and degrees that do not lead to jobs, and that graduates more students from high school ready to work, then our people will be prepared to seize their opportunities in the new economy.

If we remember that family – not government – is the most important institution in society, that all life deserves protection, and that all parents deserve to choose the education that's right for their children, then we will have a strong people and a strong nation.

And if America accepts the mantle of global leadership, by abandoning this administration's dangerous concessions to Iran, and its hostility to Israel; by reversing the hollowing out of our military; by giving our men and women in uniform the resources, care and gratitude they deserve; by no longer being passive in the face of Chinese and Russian aggression; and by ending the near total disregard for the erosion of democracy and human rights around the world; then our nation will be safer, the world more stable, and our people more prosperous.

This election is not just about what laws we will pass. It is a generational choice about what kind of country we will be.

Just yesterday, a leader from yesterday began a campaign for President by promising to take us back to yesterday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But yesterday is over, and we are never going back. We Americans are proud of our history, but our country has always been about the future. Before us now is the opportunity to author the greatest chapter yet in the amazing story of America.

We can't do that by going back to the leaders and ideas of the past. We must change the decisions we are making by changing the people who are making them.

That is why today, grounded by the lessons of our history, and inspired by the promise of our future, I announce my candidacy for President of the United States of America.

My candidacy might seem improbable to some watching from abroad. In many countries, the highest office in the land is reserved for the rich and powerful. But I live in an exceptional country where even the son of a bartender and a maid can have the same dreams and the same future as those who come from power and privilege.

I recognize the challenges of this campaign, and the demands of the office I seek. But in this endeavor as in all things, I find comfort in the ancient command to, "Be strong and courageous! Do not tremble or be dismayed, for the LORD your God is with you wherever you go."

I have heard some suggest that I should step aside and wait my turn. But I cannot. Because I believe our very identity as an exceptional nation is at stake, and I can make a difference as President.

I am humbled by the realization that America doesn't owe me anything; but I have a debt to America I must try to repay. This isn't just the country where I was born; America is the place that changed my family's history.

I regret my father did not live to see this day in person. He used to tell me all the time: En este pais, ustedes van a poder lograr todas las cosas que nosotros no pudimos.

"In this country, you will achieve all the things we never could."

On days when I am tired or discouraged, I remember the sound of his keys jingling at the front door of our home, often well past midnight, as he returned from another long day at work. When I was younger, I didn't fully appreciate all he did for us, but now as my own children grow older, I fully understand.

My father was grateful for the work he had, but that was not the life he wanted for his children. He wanted all the dreams he once had for himself to come true for us. He wanted all the doors that closed for him to be open for me.

My father stood behind a small portable bar in the back of a room for all those years, so that tonight I could stand behind this podium in the front of this room.

That journey, from behind that bar to behind this podium, is the essence of the American Dream.

Whether or not we remain a special country will depend on whether that journey is still possible for those trying to make it now:

The single mother who works long hours for little pay so her children don't have to struggle the way she has...

The student who takes two buses before dawn to attend a better school halfway across town...

The workers in our hotel kitchens, the landscaping crews in our neighborhoods, the late-night janitorial staff that clean our offices ... and the bartenders who tonight are standing in the back of a room somewhere...

If their American Dreams become impossible, we will have become just another country. But if they succeed, the 21st Century will be another American Century. This will be the message of my campaign and the purpose of my presidency.

To succeed on this journey, I will need your prayers, your support, and ultimately, your vote. Tonight I am asking you to take that first step with me, by joining us at marcorubio.com .

My wife Jeanette and my four children are here tonight. The next 19 months will take me far from home. I will miss watching Amanda run track, Daniella play volleyball, Anthony play football and Dominick play soccer.

But I have chosen this course because this election is about them. Theirs is the most important generation in American history. If we can capture the promise of this new century they will be the freest and most prosperous Americans ever. But if we fail, they will be the first generation of Americans to inherit a country worse off than the one left for their parents.

The final verdict on our generation will be written by Americans not yet born. Let us make sure they record that we made the right choice. That in the early years of this century, faced with a rapidly changing and uncertain world, our generation rose to face the great challenges of our time.

And because we did, there was still one place in the world where who you come from does not determine how far you can go.

Because we did, the American miracle lived on.

And because we did, our children and theirs lived in a new American Century.

Thank you, God bless you, and God bless the United States of America.

DNC Chair Statement on Marco Rubio's 2016 Announcement

Washington, DC – In response to Marco Rubio's announcement that he will run for president in 2016, DNC Chair Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz released the following statement:

"As Marco Rubio's presidential campaign gets underway, expect him to try and portray himself as a bold, new leader with fresh ideas. But the truth is – as those of us in Florida know all too well – he's simply peddling the same stale, harmful wares that the rest of the Republican Party is selling.

"At every opportunity, Rubio has revealed his true colors - taking outdated positions that match up with the Republican base instead of doing what's best for his constituents and the country. Rather than propose a serious tax plan that aims to grow the middle class and expand opportunity for all Americans, his plan is a GOP wish list - slashing taxes for those at the top and shifting the burden onto working Americans. He even went so far as to run away from his own immigration plan when the most extreme wing of his party put pressure on him, and he supported shutting the government down to deny people quality health care, costing our economy $24 billion.

"Rubio says he's a new type of Republican, but the only things he's ever championed are the same failed policies the public has already rejected, and the only cause he's ever advanced is his own."

Subject: What Marco Rubio really means
To: "Shulman, Holly" <ShulmanH@dnc.org >

Tonight Marco Rubio will say that "yesterday is over, and we are never going back." But Marco Rubio's policies suggest the exact opposite. Rubio's policies are a repeat of the tired Republican playbook – tax cuts for the wealthiest at the expense of hardworking families, repealing the Affordable Care Act and returning power to the insurance companies, opposing marriage equality, and opposing a woman's right to choose. Marco Rubio would erase the progress we have made and turn back the clock for women, for young people, for Latinos, and for the middle class.

Backwards for the hardworking families: Rubio's tax plan would lower taxes on corporations and raise tax rates for hardworking Americans.

Backwards for women: Rubio voted against reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act. He opposes equal pay legislation , saying it was "wasting time." Rubio has declared that he would oppose a woman's right to make her own health care decisions "even if 100 percent of my constituents were for it."

Backwards for young people: Marco Rubio voted to block a bill that would allow students to refinance their student loans.

Backwards for Latinos: Marco Rubio ran away from his own immigration reform package, bowing to political pressure, and he wants to end deportation relief that is keeping families together.

A few notes from the Rubio announcement. He gives a good speech, and sounded much more reasonable, populist and accessible than much of the rest of the GOP field. Felt more like an inspiring Democratic speech than a GOP candidate, outside of foreign policy, repealing Obamacare and choice. Lots of references to "our generation" (I.e. Him and younger voters) vs. "their generation" (them being us, Jeb, his opponents, Washington).

I assume we're sticking to leaving Rubio response to the DNC, but wanted to flag for anyone who didn't get the watch.

A few soundbites/notes:
We believe in the American Dream: They look for solutions in yesterday—
Have forgotten that when America fails to lead, global chaos follows—they appease our enemies

Our generation, they look to the past, they're still stuck in the 20th century.

Repeal and replace Obamacare
Better paying modern jobs

Family, not the government, is the most important institution in our society.
All human life deserves protection of our laws
All parents deserve to choose the education that's right for their children—strong people and strong nation.

If America once again accepts the mantle of global leadership—by abandoning concessions to Iran and hostilities to Israel
Hollowing out of the military, Vets
No longer being passive in the face of Russia and China

Generational choice about what kind of choice families will have.
Just yesterday, a leader from yesterday began a campaign for president by promising to take us back to yesterday.
Yesterday is over. We're never going back. Proud of our history, but our country has always been about the future.
Can't go back to the leaders and ideas of the past.

Subject: A Hidden Gem in Oakland

Jennifer Pae

배수진 FOR OAKLAND CITY COUNCIL • DISTRICT 2 裵秀珍

From Jennifer

From the outside it was relatively non-descript. There were large walls surrounding the property and no windows facing the street. It wasn't one of the safest neighborhoods in Oakland (he later shared a story of how he found his car up on bricks, rims and wheels swiped) but it was where Chris called home.

It was only after he opened the door and we started talking that I realized that Chris' home also doubled as a recording studio. Some of the best and brightest Oakland muscians have gone through his doors and recorded on his fully equipped award winning facilities. He is also a musician, often traveling the world on various projects, most recently playing live music in Russia for a silent film. Chris is an Oaklander, in every sense of the word.

Later that week, he sent the campaign an e-mail. "It made a huge impression that Jennifer came out door to door to speak with us," Chris said. "We don't get out to speak to our neighbors too often and to have an up and coming city council member show so much interest in our part of Oakland really was great for us to see. You have our vote."

Since then, Chris came out to my birthday party fundraiser, took a window sign and came to City Hall to watch my debate this week. And last night, Chris, who has never volunteered for a political candidate before, came by our office and made close to a 100 phone calls to voters.

Chris is my inspiration as I move forward with knocking on doors and talking to voters. It's time for our voices to reach City Hall and time for neighborhoods to feel truly empowered again. I chose to run for Oakland City Council to give voice to people like Chris. If this is important to you, then join Chris - sign up to call voters today.

Together we can,

Jennifer Pae

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall Meeting Nashua, NH

Hello Big Campaign,
Just off the phone with our tracker Greg who is on the ground in Nashua, NH today. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:
- Heated exchange on Social Security when the president of a retiree org. asked McCain why he supports SS privatization; McCain said "'I am not for privatizing social security -- never have been, never will be."
- Prior to the question, McCain banters with the retiree about how old they are
- McCain criticizes economists for all the things they didn't foresee, e.g. burst of the dot com bubble, housing crisis

NASHUA, NH - McCain Town Hall Meeting 06/12/08

Background Details:
- Sen. John Sununu opened the event
- Sen. Warren Rudman (R-NH) spoke and introduced McCain
- McCain entered the stage to the 'Rocky' theme music
- Gov. Walter Peterson
- 600 people in a gym - pretty packed. All white.
- About 20 protesters outside the event, protesting against 'third term of Bush.' [no tracker footage].
- Usual press, national networks, traveling and local affiliates
- Staffers (including press aides) were basically all local - doesn't seem to have travelling staff?
- Cindy and Meghan were not there.
- Our tracker had no trouble getting in the event.

Speech Highlights:

Opening Remarks
- Promised wouldn't tell any corny jokes, but it's hard to break old habits
- 'I love the state of New Hampshire and I can't thank you enough.'
- Acknowledges 'Welcome Home' sign.
- "I'm so happy to be back. I'm so happy to be back."
- Touts 102 town hall meetings.
- Says I need you this November.
- Underscores apparent commitment to climate change
- Says campaign is all about putting country first, above all else
- Recognizes ONE and Divided We Fail
- Thanks veterans and asks them to stand
- 'This campaign is about reform, prosperity and peace.'
- Right kind of change, not going back to the failed policies of 60s and 70s, not the second term of Jimmy Carter ('I thought that was a pretty good line')
- HEALTH CARE: I have a plan that will put the power in the hands of families and not the federal government
- RENEWABLE ENERGY: That's our mission and we can do it
- GAS TAX HOLIDAY: If you want to call it a gimmick, fine. That is coming from the economists who didn't see the sub-prime mortgage meltdown and dot-com meltdown
- IRAQ
    - I hate war
    - I knew what the right strategy was
    - We are winning. We are succeeding.
    - Obama still doesn't acknowledge that we're succeeding in Iraq.
    - I'll bring 'em home. We'll do it and we'll do it the right way.

- My highest priority

Question and Answer:

Q1) What will we do to protect ourselves from southern invasion? What will we do to protect value of US dollar?
MCCAIN: Secure the borders, temporary workers, get 12mil who are here illegally in line, deport the millions who have committed crimes, biometric IDs
You're right; when the dollar is devalued, the price of gas goes up. We have to talk up the dollar. The fundamental problem is out-of-control spending.
Follow-up: Will you prosecute those employers who hire illegals?
MCCAIN: Yes, sir. But only after, the employer is able to secure temporary workers. We can expect small business owners to be the INS.

COMMENT - Thanks for helping to set up the first homeless veteran shelter. Thank you.

Q 2) Father is vietnam vet -- has been to many nations teaching people how to take care of their own. Will you increase that teaching.?
MCCAIN: Yes. That is the point of the surge. Tell your father thank you for serving.

Q 3) I'd like to highlight Janet Quilty -- mom, of son who gave his arm and leg in Iraq.
MCCAIN: Thank you for his sacrifice.
Follow up: In your book, you quote Mo Udall. My family is getting hammered by oil prices. Any relief on the way?
MCCAIN: In the short-term, we will see a decrease of barrel costs. People looking into the unnecessary increase of oil. But like JFK did with going to the moon, I challenge America to decrease our dependence on foreign oil.
Follow-up: Thank you. That was the answer I was looking for.
MCCAIN: Senator Obama said he didn't mind the cost increase in gas. He said it was just a little too quick. And we need to use nuclear energy. And Obama's plan doesn't have any of that - it doesn't mention nuclear energy at all.

Q 4) What are you going to do to help our education system -- especially special needs children?
MCCAIN: No Child Left Behind is a good start -- step in the right direction. Let's fix NCLB, let's not scrap it. We'll work together, learn the lessons of it. Also, fully fund the special programs that are federally fund. I believe that we can fix the NCLB.
New Orleans had to start from square one and there are now 30 charter schools. New Orleans is doing better because of choice. Choice and competition is the answer.
Follow-up: You need to look at each individual child. It's impossible to meet the expectations of NCLB.
MCCAIN: Why don't we reward good teachers. Give teachers incentives to do a good job.

Q 5) I'm a health care voter. Many insurance companies don't cover those with a pre-existing condition. What will you do to cover discrimination of this sort and will you pledge to do so?
MCCAIN: We will have to establish GAP - Government Approved Programs. Bring the governors together and come up with a plan to cover those with pre-existing conditions. We are going to have to have these GAP's to expand risk pools to cover the uninsurables.
Follow-up: I'm worried about cancer survivors.
MCCAIN: I'd like to change the law so people can shop all over the US. I'll give them $5k to shop for it. I'd like to give people choices, allow them to go across state lines.
Follow-up: Are you going to allow people to supercede Michelle's law?
MCCAIN: I want people to have the ability to be able to go across state lines. Health care is the elephant in the room. Thanks for bringing it up.

Q 6) Thank you. I'm a Massachusetts resident. Obama said college education is a birth right for all Americans. I have a limited income and I'm not able to pay for my kids to attend. I have concern with Senator Obama's idea -- that college is a birth right. What I fear is that the academic prestige of institutions will be compromised.
MCCAIN: We have to make a college education affordable and accessible. Not everyone has to go to college -- but those who want to and have the credentials should be able to do so without taking on the burden of huge loans.

Q 7) You've stated you're in support of privatization of SS. Why would you put people on the roulette wheel of the market?

MCCAIN: Quips: I can relate to seniors' issues. It's their $$$. I'm not for privatization of SS. I just want workers to put a small amount into an acct.
'I am not for privatizing social security -- never have been, never will be.'

Reagan and Tip O'Neil fixed it. We can do it again. We have to come together, not fight about it to solve it. I commit to you that I'll fix it.

Q 8) As a Christian, what would you do for this country?

MCCAIN: We're a Judeo-Christian nation, but we accept other faiths.

Q 9) Should we do more for veterans?

MCCAIN: Health care for vets. Give them plastic card so they can get their treatment at private facilities.

Q 10) What would your Supreme Court look like?

MCCAIN: Justice John Roberts - that is my ideal guy. I will appoint strict-constructionist judges. Obama was against confirmation of Roberts and Alito. I voted to confirm Ginsburg, etc. because they were qualified.

Q 11) What are you going to do about over-spending?

MCCAIN: Cut wasteful pork-barrel and earmark spending, etc.

Q 12) McCain asked from person from ONE campaign to speak. Person spoke about ONE, then asked about bill currently in Congress to provide AIDS assistance.

MCCAIN: Thanks Sununu for his advocacy on the issue. I would support this bill. Says Pres Bush and Laura Bush deserve credit for their efforts on this issue.

McCain brings up farm bill.

ONE campaign representative thanks McCain for his veto of farm bill since American agricultural subsidies distort foreign markets and hurt farmers in other countries.

Q 13) Concerned parent asked if the government could do more to prevent stores from selling violent video games to children, even if they're with their parents.

MCCAIN: It's up to the parents. There's an "utter evil," which is child porn on the Internet - we need to work to prevent it.

Follow-up: What is your strategy for dealing with the "liberal" mainstream media, which likes Obama and ignores you?

MCCAIN: That's how it is in the media But joint town halls would allow us to bypass the media and communicate directly with voters.

McCain concludes with trope that he has a record of always putting his country before himself.

SAN FRANCISCO — Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton is returning to San Francisco to headline a Democratic fundraiser.

Clinton is scheduled to address a sold-out women's luncheon at the Fairmont Hotel to raise money for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

The fundraiser will also feature House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi.

The former secretary of state gave the keynote address last week at Dreamforce 2014, a software convention held in San Francisco.

Clinton has traveled widely after leaving the State Department to give speeches to industry groups, college students and others.

A potential Democratic presidential candidate in 2016, Clinton also has been stepping up her campaign activity for Democrats in the weeks before the November elections.

Portland Press Herald: Hillary Clinton coming to Maine on Friday to stump for Michaud

By Dennis Hoey

October 19, 2014 5:15 p.m. EDT

With the debates in the tightly contested gubernatorial race due to end this week, one campaign – on the eve ofMonday night's televised debate – stepped up its efforts to attract undecided voters by announcing that one of the nation's best-known politicians will appear on its behalf in Maine this week.

U.S. Rep. Mike Michaud's campaign said Sunday that former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton will be in Scarborough on Friday to campaign with the Democratic candidate for governor.

"There is so much at stake in this election, and we can't take anything for granted. If we want change in Augusta, we have to make it happen," Michaud said in a statement. "That's why I am so humbled and excited to have Hillary Clinton coming to Maine to rally voters and join me in energizing supporters so we can ensure a great turnout on Election Day."

A spokesman for Gov. Paul LePage's re-election campaign responded to the news that the former first lady would speak to a crowd at Scarborough High School by saying that voters can expect to see at least one more "high-profile Republican" come to Maine on LePage's behalf before the Nov. 4 election.

Meanwhile, independent gubernatorial candidate Eliot Cutler, who has been endorsed by independent U.S. Sen. Angus King, a former Maine governor, said the news that Clinton would be coming to Maine is a sign "that (Michaud's) campaign is in trouble" and needs a jump-start from a big-name politician.

Monday's debate will be held on the Portland campus of the University of Southern Maine. The debate – to be aired on WGME-TV, Channel 13 – is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m. in Hannaford Hall.

The final scheduled televised debate will be Tuesday night at the Auburn studios of WMTW-TV, Channel 8. It also will start at 7 p.m.

Lizzy Reinholt, a spokeswoman for Michaud's campaign, said the previous debates have not significantly changed voters' opinions of the candidates.

"I think the dynamics remain the same. It's going to be a tight race between us and Gov. LePage," Reinholt said.

Most polls have placed Michaud and LePage in a tight race with Cutler trailing well behind, but Cutler says polls can be misleading.

"Polls are snapshots in time," Cutler said in a telephone interview Sunday night. "I'm more confident today than I was yesterday. The race is wide open."

Cutler said he believes that a strong showing by a candidate in a debate can influence the way a person votes, especially the large number of undecided voters that remain in Maine. In 2010, Cutler made a late surge in the governor's race and came close to defeating LePage.

Alex Willette, LePage's re-election campaign spokesman, said the governor has used previous debates as a way to communicate directly to voters.

"The governor has been able to get his message out without the fetters of a newspaper," Willette said. "People know he is a plain-spoken guy who doesn't mince words."

Willette noted that Republican Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey has visited Maine three times this year to campaign on behalf of LePage.

Former Republican Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida also came to Maine in February to host a fundraiser for the governor.

Willette said he was unable to disclose the identity of the high-profile Republican who is expected to come to Maine later this month.

Reinholt said the Michaud campaign event that Clinton will attend at Scarborough High School will be open to the public beginning at 4:30 p.m. Friday. She said those who want to attend may RSVP atwww.michaud2014.com/hillary. President Obama is scheduled to appear Oct. 30 at the Portland Exposition Building on behalf of Michaud.

Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton, and first lady Michelle Obama have already come to Maine this year to campaign for Michaud.

Cutler's campaign announced Sunday that he had received an endorsement from the Portsmouth Herald.

Bloomberg: Getting Ready for Hillary Costs About $1,000 Per Hour

By John McCormick

October 20, 2014 6:59 a.m. EDT

The super-PAC is building a list of supporters that is already hovering around 3 million.

Hillary Clinton's friendly super-PAC is spending roughly $23,000 a day – nearly as much as it's bringing in – as it builds a database of supporters and donors for a possible 2016 Democratic presidential bid.

Viewed another way: Getting Ready for Hillary costs her supporters about $2 million per quarter, covering expenses for everything from political consultants to voter databases to Des Moines hotel rooms, according to disclosure reports released October 15.

"Rather than building up a large bankroll, we have sought to invest in engaging our supporters and building our list for the day that Hillary's decision comes," said Seth Bringman, the super-PAC's spokesman.

It costs money to raise money, and the group's biggest expenses include printing, postage and online advertising. Payroll and travel costs also continue to grow. Bringman said the super-PAC has about 35 full-time employees. "Given that her decision is looming, I wouldn't anticipate that we will staff up much more," he said.

Based in a Virginia suburb outside Washington, Ready for Hillary raised $2 million and spent about $2.1 million during the quarter that ended September 30.

By comparison, Senator Rand Paul's Rand PAC spent a fraction of that, about $598,000 while raising $480,363. Like the Clinton group, the Republican is using his PAC to stockpile supporters and favors for a potential White House bid.

Ready for Hillary's fundraising prowess has helped create what amounts to the most robust campaign infrastructure of any prospective 2016 candidate, whether Democrat or Republican. The group says it has connected with more than 3 million Clinton supporters, persuaded 900,000 people to sign a pledge to help her win if she runs and distributed 600,000 bumper stickers. Contributions have arrived from more than 100,000 people in all 50 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and every U.S. territory.

Nicco Mele, who teaches classes on the Internet and politics at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, has estimated that presidential candidates will probably need an online list of 1 million to 3 million people to be financially competitive.

To understand just how quickly the money can flow, look to mid-September, when Senator Tom Harkin's annual Steak Fry committee spent more than $50,000 for a private jet to shuttle Bill and Hillary Clinton into and out of Iowa. Ready for Hillary also racked up some major bills.

The super-PAC paid for hotel rooms for virtually its entire staff as well as key activists, roughly 60 to 70 people in total, Bringman said. The weekend bill at the Des Moines Marriott? More than $27,000.

"We wanted to make as big a contribution as possible," Bringman said, adding that staff and volunteers helped shuttle Democrats to the steak fry and pitched in to build the set for the one-day event. Ready for Hillary also contributed $5,000 directly to the steak fry committee and paid the Iowa Democratic Party $20,000 for its database of participants in the 2008 Iowa caucuses, Bringman said, adding that the group will be making similar data acquisitions in other states with early 2016 nomination contests.

"We've done a lot of work in Iowa compiling our list of supporters there," he said. "We want to understand who our supporters are and how best to communicate with them."

More expenses, as reported to the Federal Election Commission:

Airlines

Staff members went to Iowa and back, but that wasn't all of their travel. During the third quarter the super-PAC spent $69,657 with three airlines – Delta, US Airways and United. Staff members routinely travel to train volunteers and coordinate fundraisers events, Bringman said.

Stamps and snail mail

It may be a dot-com world, but Hillary's allies still spend plenty on postage stamps. Stamps.com was paid $38,280 during the quarter. An additional $5,164 went to the Postal Service. And Windward Strategies of Bethesda, Md. got more cash from the group than any other entity: $558,319 for "direct mail production," which Bringman said includes design, copy, printing and postage.

Networking

Ready for Hillary also set out to make friends, donating about $58,000 to candidates and state-level political parties, mostly in states with early nomination contests. Its biggest contribution during the quarter – $25,000 – was to Jack Hatch's campaign for Iowa governor. The Democrat trailed Republican Governor Terry Branstad in a recent Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa Poll, but he could provide a valuable network of political activists if Clinton decides to run.

Bloomberg: Could Hillary Clinton Blow a Lead This Big?

By Jonathan Allen

October 19, 2014 12:15 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The gap between HRC and her competition for a presidential nomination keeps growing.

The anybody-but-Clinton crowd would need a champion with even better closing speed than President Barack Obama to deny Hillary Clinton the party's presidential nomination again.

A new ABC/Washington Post poll shows Clinton with a 51-point lead over Vice President Joe Biden, her nearest competitor for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination. Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren, who has said she won't run, comes in third.

Clinton's 64-13-11 advantage over Biden and Warren is consistent with other recent polling, and it will surely renew calls from anti-Clinton corners to remember just how far she fell in 2008.

It wasn't this far.

In October 2006, Clinton led then-Senator Barack Obama by — wait for it — 11 points. Over the next year, she would expand her 28-17 advantage in that CNN poll as Obama failed to gain significant ground.

Clinton peaked in October 2007, taking 51 percent of registered Democrats in CNN and CBS polls and registering a 31-point lead over Obama — 48-17 — in an L.A. Times/Bloomberg survey.

Harper's Magazine: Stop Hillary! Vote no to a Clinton dynasty

By Doug Henwood

November 2014 Issue

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"How's that hopey, changey stuff working out for you?" Sarah Palin asked American voters in a taunting 2010 speech. The answer: Not so well. We avoided a full-blown depression, but the job market remains deeply sick, and it's become quite mainstream to talk about the U.S. economy having fallen into structural stagnation (though the rich are thriving). Barack Obama has, if anything, seemed more secretive than George W. Bush. He kills alleged terrorists whom his predecessor would merely have tortured. The climate crisis gets worse, and the political capacity even to talk about it, much less do anything about it, is completely absent. These aren't the complaints Palin would make, of course. But people who voted for Obama in 2008 were imagining a more peaceful, more egalitarian world, and they haven't gotten it.

Be of good cheer, though. Many savants — and not all of them Democrats — have a solution for 2016. That would be putting Hillary Clinton in the White House.

What is the case for Hillary (whose quasi-official website identifies her, in bold blue letters, by her first name only, as do millions upon millions of voters)? It boils down to this: She has experience, she's a woman, and it's her turn. It's hard to find any substantive political argument in her favor. She has, in the past, been associated with women's issues, with children's issues — but she also encouraged her husband to sign the 1996 bill that put an end to the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program (AFDC), which had been in effect since 1935. Indeed, longtime Clinton adviser Dick Morris, who has now morphed into a right-wing pundit, credits Hillary for backing both of Bill's most important moves to the center: the balanced budget and welfare reform.1 And during her subsequent career as New York's junior senator and as secretary of state, she has scarcely budged from the centrist sweet spot, and has become increasingly hawkish on foreign policy.

1 Morris's ties to the Clinton machine go back nearly four decades. That said, his pronouncements on both Bill and Hillary should be taken with a substantial grain of salt. Their mutual-admiration society collapsed in 1996, when media reports about Morris's frolics with prostitutes caused his expulsion from Bill's reelection campaign. Since then, the uber-consultant has turned on his old patrons, flaying them in such books as Rewriting History (2004) and Because He Could (2004), and founding, in September 2013, a PAC called Just Say No to Hillary. On the subject of Morris, Hillary has for years kept conspicuously mum. On the subject of Hillary, Morris was typically dismissive when we spoke in July. "She's a trial lawyer who fights for a position," he told me. "But she's not creative and she's not a broad strategic-policy thinker." The gun-for-hire accusation was particularly poignant coming from Morris, who has worked for figures as diverse as Jesse Helms and Howard Metzenbaum, Trent Lott and Kenyan presidential contender Raila Odinga — and who, indeed, was advising House Republicans at the same time he was rescuing Bill's imperiled presidency after the 1994 midterms.

What Hillary will deliver, then, is more of the same. And that shouldn't surprise us. As wacky as it sometimes appears on the surface, American politics has an amazing stability and continuity about it. Obama, widely viewed as a populist action hero during the 2008 campaign, made no bones about his admiration for Ronald Reagan. The Gipper, he said, changed the trajectory of America in a way that Richard Nixon did not and in a way that Bill Clinton did not. He put us on a fundamentally different path because the country was ready for it. I think they felt [that] with all the excesses of the Sixties and the Seventies, government had grown and grown, but there wasn't much sense of accountability in terms of how it was operating.

Now, the "excesses of the Sixties and the Seventies" included things like feminism, gay liberation, the antiwar movement, a militant civil rights movement — all good things, in my view, but I know that many people disagree. In any case, coming into office with something like a mandate, Obama never tried to make a sharp political break with the past, as Reagan did from the moment of his first inaugural address. Reagan dismissed the postwar Keynesian consensus — the idea that government had a responsibility to soften the sharpest edges of capitalism by fighting recession and providing some sort of basic safety net. Appropriating some of the language of the left about revolution and the promise of the future, he unleashed what he liked to call the magic of the marketplace: cutting taxes for the rich, eliminating regulations, and whittling away at social spending.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What Reagan created, with his embrace of the nutty Laffer curve and his smiling war on organized labor, was a strange, unequally distributed boom that lasted through the early 1990s. After the caretaker George H. W. Bush administration evaporated, Bill Clinton took over and, with a few minor adjustments, kept the party going for another decade. Profits skyrocketed, as did the financial markets.

But there was a contradiction under it all: a system dependent on high levels of mass consumption for both economic dynamism and political legitimacy has a problem when mass purchasing power is squeezed. For a few decades, consumers borrowed to make up for what their paychecks were lacking. But that model broke down once and for all with the crisis of 2008. Today we desperately need a new political economy — one that features a more equal distribution of income, investment in our rotting social and physical infrastructure, and a more humane ethic. We also need a judicious foreign policy, and a commander-in-chief who will resist the instant gratification of air strikes and rhetorical bluster.

Is Hillary Clinton the answer to these prayers? It's hard to think so, despite the widespread liberal fantasy of her as a progressive paragon, who will follow through exactly as Barack Obama did not. In fact, a close look at her life and career is perhaps the best antidote to all these great expectations.

The historical record, such as it is, may also be the only antidote, since most progressives are unwilling to discuss Hillary in anything but the most general, flattering terms. Pundits who have written about her in the past dismissed my queries in rude and patronizing ways. Strangely, though, I was contacted out of nowhere by a representative of something called American Bridge, who wanted to make my acquaintance. At first I thought it was a new think tank — but I soon found out it was a pro-Hillary lobbying group formed by the G.O.P. apostate David Brock. I can't prove it, of course, but it sure felt like the Hillary machine was subtly attempting to spin this piece. Brock himself declined to speak with me, as did a diplomat who had worked for Hillary at the State Department. Apparently you have to take a loyalty oath to get an interview.

Hillary Rodham grew up in the affluent Chicago suburb of Park Ridge, Illinois. In her child-rearing manual, It Takes a Village (1996), she recalls that her family "looked like it was straight out of the 1950s television sitcom Father Knows Best."

Hillary has a long history of being economical with the truth.2 One can forgive her reticence about sharing the traumas of her childhood, which included her father cutting down his brother's corpse from a noose. But it was not the stuff of sitcoms. As Gail Sheehy reports, Hugh Rodham was an "authoritarian drillmaster," a reactionary who demanded austerity, discipline, and self-reliance. Displays of emotion were regarded as signs of weakness. Her mother, Dorothy Rodham, fought loudly with her husband — but ultimately put up with him, as Hillary would with her future husband.

2 Discussing her voluminous but minimally informative memoir Living History (2003), Carl Bernstein noted that it was mostly valuable for its "insight into how Hillary sees herself and wants the story of her life to be told. It is often at variance with my reporting, other books, and with newspapers and periodicals as well."

Hillary absorbed the conservatism of her father and her surroundings. In junior high, she fell under the influence of a history teacher, Paul Carlson, a frothing McCarthyite. As Carlson told Sheehy, the young Hillary was "a hawk."

Soon after, though, she found another guru, one she would stick with for years — a young minister at the First Methodist Church of Park Ridge named Don Jones. Jones was a dashing intellectual who helped open Hillary's mind. He got the church youth reading D. H. Lawrence, listening to Bob Dylan, and talking about Picasso. He took them to the South Side of Chicago to meet with black and Latino teenagers. In January 1963, Jones upped the ante further and brought Hillary to hear Martin Luther King Jr. speak in Chicago — and escorted her onstage to meet him. She was moved, but not enough to stop her from campaigning for Goldwater in 1964.

Then she was off to Wellesley, where she eventually began to feel alienated from what she called “the entire unreality of middle-class America.” Still, Hillary was not about to become a student revolutionary: identifying herself as an “agnostic intellectual liberal [and] emotional conservative,” she stayed away from the protests and picket lines.

Hillary wrote her undergraduate thesis on the founder of community organizing, Saul Alinsky. Her academic adviser, Alan Schechter, told Bill’s biographer David Maraniss that she “started out thinking community action programs would make a big difference,” but later dismissed them as “too idealistic and simplistic” and compromised by their dependence on outside money and help. There’s an interesting hint of Hillary’s future in her characterization of Alinsky’s thinking: “Welfare programs since the New Deal have neither redeveloped poverty areas nor even catalyzed the poor into helping themselves. A cycle of dependency has been created which ensnares its victims into resignation and apathy.” While there’s an element of truth to this, Alinsky’s remedy was for poor people to claim political power on their own behalf. Hillary, as we have already seen, would instead support welfare “reform” in the 1990s, leaving single mothers at the mercy of the low-wage job market.

During Hillary’s senior year, a movement arose to have a student speaker at graduation, and she was universally seen as the one for the job. Her remarks, though enthusiastically received, were meandering. What stands out, however, is this remarkable passage:

We are, all of us, exploring a world that none of us even understands and attempting to create within that uncertainty. But there are some things we feel, feelings that our prevailing, acquisitive, and competitive corporate life, including tragically the universities, is not the way of life for us. We’re searching for more immediate, ecstatic, and penetrating modes of living.

3 Bill, another pragmatist to the core, hit a similarly emotional note during a 1993 speech to the National Realtors Association, in which he quoted some cherished lines by Carl Sandburg: “A tough will counts. So does desire. / So does a rich soft wanting. / Without rich wanting nothing arrives.” That’s right. Under all that duplicity and ambition, they’re just a pair of romantics.

That is not the Hillary we know today.3 But the practical Hillary has always had a gift for overruling the ecstatic and penetrating Hillary: when Alinsky offered her an organizing job after college, she rejected it in favor of law school. He said, “Well, that’s no way to change anything.” She responded: “Well, I see a different way from you. And I think there is a real opportunity.”

It’s widely known that Hillary and Bill met when they were students at Yale Law School; it’s less known that their first date essentially involved crossing a picket line. Bill suggested they go to a Rothko exhibition at the university’s art gallery, but it was closed because of a strike by unionized employees. After clearing away some garbage that had piled up during the strike, Bill convinced a guard to let them in. Hillary was impressed — and not for the first time — by his powers of persuasion. She found him “complex,” with “lots of layers.”

By Yale Law standards, Hillary was a conservative, which meant that she opposed the Vietnam War but still basically believed in American institutions. Despite looking like a hippie in her tinted glasses and candy-striped slacks, she had no patience for the utopianism of the time.

In 1973, the year after she graduated from law school, she published a paper in the Harvard Educational Review on the legal rights of children. She’d gotten interested in the topic when she heard Marian Wright Edelman — the first black woman admitted to the Mississippi bar — speak at Yale. After the lecture, she approached Edelman and ended up working at her D.C.-based public-interest law firm during the summer of 1970, focusing on the conditions of migrant farm laborers and their families.

Although the right would later denounce Hillary's paper as a radical anti-family screed, which supposedly advocated turning over the work of child-rearing to the state, it was anything but. In "Children Under the Law," she concluded that the state was obliged to intervene only in the case of actual harm to children — a standard that had to be extremely strict:

Only medically justifiable reasons for intervention should be acceptable. Parental behavior that does not result in medically diagnosable harm to a child should not be allowed to trigger intervention, however offensive that behavior may be to the community.

It was the first in a series of legal articles on children and families, and an early instance of what she would characterize as a lifelong interest in such issues. Hillary later chaired the board of Edelman's Children's Defense Fund (CDF) — though her relationship with her former mentor would be strained by Bill's 1996 welfare legislation, which Edelman angrily condemned, declaring that his "signature on this pernicious bill makes a mockery of his pledge not to hurt children."

Soon after his own graduation, Bill returned to Arkansas — first for a stint as a law professor, and then to run for Congress. He advised John Doar, who was putting together the legal team for the Nixon impeachment case, to hire Hillary, who was then at the CDF. Yet according to Maraniss, Bill also sounded out the Arkansas politician David Pryor for his thoughts on how this might affect his own political future. "He knew that his career would be in politics," Pryor told Maraniss, "and the question was whether Hillary's connection with the Watergate committee might have political ramifications."

In any case, she was hired. On the impeachment-committee staff, Hillary became friends with Bernard Nussbaum, who would later serve as Bill's White House counsel. She told him — and anyone else who would listen — that her boyfriend was destined to be president someday. Nussbaum, not surprisingly, thought this was delusional. In Sheehy's account, Hillary tore into him:

You asshole. Bernie, you're a jerk. You don't know this guy. I know this guy. So don't pontificate to me. He is going to be president of the United States.

Of course, expectations were high for her too. So what to do after the impeachment committee dissolved in 1974? She could go back to the CDF. She could go to Washington, work at a law firm, and get a feel for politics — a route complicated by her having failed the D.C. bar exam, an embarrassing fact she kept secret for thirty years. Or she could move to Arkansas to be with Bill. She had visited a few times, but moving to the sticks made her nervous.

She chose Arkansas, where Bill's 1974 congressional campaign was already under way. He lost. But he also made a name for himself, challenging an incumbent against long odds and almost beating him, and immediately began thinking of the next race. His eye was on the governorship, but he thought attorney general might be a better first step.

Hillary, meanwhile, was teaching law and running the school's legal-aid clinic. They spent lots of time together, but marriage was still an open question. She had political ambitions and worried that she would be a bad feminist if she took on family obligations. To gauge the wisdom of marrying Bill, who had already proposed several times, she went back East and canvassed her friends. When she returned to Arkansas, Bill greeted her with a house he had just bought and another marriage proposal. She accepted.

During his 1976 campaign for attorney general, Bill alienated the state's unions by refusing to support the repeal of Arkansas's right-to-work law. It was the first in a long line of gestures aimed at distancing himself from traditional liberal politics. This election he won — though everyone knew the office was just a stepping stone.

The young couple moved from the relatively bohemian Fayetteville to the more formal Little Rock. Hillary went from the legal clinic to the Rose Law Firm, which represented the moneyed interests of Arkansas. It did not hurt her prospects at the firm that her husband was the state's chief legal officer. Not that Bill planned to stay AG for very long. Less than a year after the election, his chief of staff called in a brash young political consultant from New York, Dick Morris, to evaluate Bill's next step — governor or senator? Morris urged a race for governor, beginning a twenty-year association, interrupted by occasional storms, between the crafty tactician and both Clintons.

While at Rose, Hillary's allegiances began to shift. The community-organizing group ACORN, then based in Arkansas and very much in the Alinsky tradition, got a ballot measure passed that would lower electricity rates for residential users in Little Rock and raise them for commercial users. Business, of course, was not pleased, and filed a legal challenge, with Rose representing them. Wade Rathke, the founder of ACORN and a friend of Hillary's, was shocked to see her arguing the case in court. And not only did she argue the case — she helped to craft the underlying legal strategy, which was that the new rate schedule amounted to an unconstitutional "taking of property." This is now a common right-wing argument against regulation, and Hillary was one of its early architects.

Bill won the 1978 gubernatorial election and embraced as one of his signature programs the improvement of the state's miserable highway system. He chose to finance it by raising automobile license fees — which proved enormously unpopular and was a major reason he lost his bid for reelection two years later.

Almost as soon as the ballots were counted, Bill and his consigliere began plotting his comeback. Morris's polling discovered that the people of Arkansas liked Bill, more or less, but saw him as someone who had gone astray at Yale and Oxford. Morris advised him to do a televised mea culpa, which he did. And Hillary, who'd been sticking with her maiden name like the feminist she was, now took Bill's. He won. And he, Hillary, and Morris together decided that the best way to conduct politics was through a permanent campaign. Policy and polling would be inseparable.

This model of governance also depended on enemies. Bill & Co. — and Hillary was intimately involved with this choice from the beginning — picked the teachers' union. A court had declared the Arkansas education-finance system unconstitutional: it was woefully unequal, with teachers in some districts paid so poorly that they qualified for food stamps. Raising taxes in any serious manner would be a political challenge. So the Clinton team paired a modest, one-point increase in the sales tax with a proposed competence test for teachers. The Arkansas public was not fond of the teachers' union, Morris found, so Bill could present himself as doing it all for the kids. And, as Morris noted, it was a politically crafty break from the Old Democrat left.

As Bernstein recounts, the Arkansas State Teachers Association "was not exactly the antichrist, and in fact had done some pretty good things in a state where the legislature had typically accorded more attention to protecting the rights of poultry farmers to saturate half of Arkansas's topsoil with chicken feces than providing its children with a decent education." But setting them up as the enemy paid rich political dividends. Clinton got the tax increase and the competence test.

These measures did not, however, lead to any significant improvement in the state's educational performance. A review of the reform efforts by the Winthrop Rockefeller Foundation later found "a serious, large demoralization of the teaching force. They feel constrained by what they perceive to be a stranglehold of mandates, needless paperwork and limited encouragement." The problems of the educational system were so structural, so deeply rooted in the state's poverty and backwardness, that it would require a wholesale overhaul of the political economy to fix them — and the Clintons weren't about to take that on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, they were laying the groundwork for what would eventually hit the national stage as the New Democrat movement, which took institutional form as the Democratic Leadership Council. Teacher testing and right-to-work were nice ways to show his (their, really) distance from organized labor. Bill went light on environmental enforcement and spread around tax breaks in the name of economic development. Tyson Foods, the major producer of that aforementioned chicken shit, got nearly $8 million in such breaks between 1988 and 1990, at a time when the company's budget was twice the state's.

When she wasn't busy doing political work for the Clinton enterprise, Hillary was defending the leading lights of Arkansas business at Rose and serving on corporate boards — including the viciously anti-union Walmart (though she did encourage the company to begin a recycling program). And inevitably, there were connections between Rose and the state government, from routine bond issues to more complex litigation. It was all a little smelly, and would later cause the couple no end of headaches.

The Clintons had outgrown Arkansas. Bill contemplated running for president in 1988 but decided not to, in part because he was terrified that one or more of his countless paramours would come forward. But four years later, he found his nerve. There were still plenty of skeletons in the closet, of course. An internal campaign memo from March 1992 listed more than seventy-five potential problems for the candidacy. Among them, needless to say, were Bill's many women — but about two thirds of the sore spots involved both Bill and Hillary, and eighteen of them pertained to Hillary's work at Rose.

He won anyway. It was the next stage of what they had earlier called the Journey — their joint venture to change the world. (Hillary's private slogan was: "Eight years of Bill, eight years of Hill.") They settled into something resembling a copresidency, with Hillary exercising an influence no previous First Lady ever had. And she caused trouble right from the start. Always suspicious of the media, she shut off reporters' access to the West Wing of the White House. It ended up alienating the press to no good effect.

More substantively, Hillary was given responsibility for running the health-care reform agenda. It was very much a New Democrat scheme. Rejecting a Canadian-style single-payer system, Hillary and her team came up with an impossibly complex arrangement called "managed competition." Employers would be encouraged to provide health care to their workers, individuals would be assembled into cooperatives with some bargaining power, and competition among providers would keep costs down. But it was done in total secrecy, with no attempt to cultivate support in Congress or among the public for what would be a massive piece of legislation — and one vehemently opposed by the medical-industrial complex.

At a meeting with Democratic leaders in April 1993, Senator Bill Bradley suggested that she might need to compromise to get a bill passed. Hillary would have none of it: the White House would "demonize" any legislators who stood in her way. Bradley was stunned. Years later, he told Bernstein:

That was it for me in terms of Hillary Clinton. You don't tell members of the Senate you are going to demonize them. It was obviously so basic to who she is. The arrogance. . . . The disdain.

Health-care reform was a conspicuous failure, and most of the blame has to fall on Hillary. Dusting herself off, she soon reinvented herself as a freewheeling "advocate." In Living History, she recalls changing gears to focus on "children's health issues, breast cancer prevention, and protecting funding for public television, legal services, and the arts." She campaigned for changes in the adoption laws and for a bill to guarantee that newborns and their mothers wouldn't be kicked out of the hospital sooner than forty-eight hours after the birth. It was all very high-minded, and good for her image, but of limited impact.

She did, however, throw her weight behind Bill's controversial initiative to (as he put it more than once) "end welfare as we know it." In Living History, she insists that welfare reform was designed to be "the beginning, not the end, of our concern for the poor." Really? The whole point of welfare reform was disciplining the poor, not helping them. Still, she bragged that during the Clinton era, "welfare rolls had dropped 60 percent from 14.1 million to 5.8 million, and millions of parents had gone to work."

Of course, those gains came during the strongest economic expansion of the past several decades, which was itself the byproduct of the unsustainable dot-com bubble. In August 2014, the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities published a report on how the Clinton welfare regime, officially designated as Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF), had worked out over the longer term. They found that TANF is serving fewer families despite increased demand, that the value of benefits has eroded to the point where beneficiaries can't meet their basic needs, and that it does far less to reduce poverty than its predecessor, AFDC. In addition, the report noted that almost all of the early employment gains for single mothers have since been reversed.

And then there were the scandals, many of them Hillary's. The most famous was Whitewater, a word it pains me to type. Democrats love to say that there was nothing to that scandal. While it was certainly not the diabolical conspiracy Republicans made it out to be during the fevered days of the Clinton impeachment, it was not nothing. In short: A sleazy and well-connected pal of the Clintons, Jim McDougal, came to them in 1978 with a proposal to invest in a piece of undeveloped riverfront land in the Ozark Mountains that he hoped to turn into vacation homes. They took the bait — and paid almost no attention afterward, which turned out to be a mistake.

What happened was that McDougal then bought himself a savings and loan association, which he renamed Madison Guaranty and used to fund his real estate ventures, Whitewater among them. Speculators operating on borrowed money are always dangerous — doubly so when they've got their own bank to draw on. And Madison Guaranty, like hundreds of other S&Ls in the early 1980s, was bleeding money. By 1985, a desperate McDougal hired Rose to handle the bank's legal affairs. That was malodorous in itself, since Madison was regulated by the state and a Rose partner was the governor's wife. But the Clintons, of course, were also investors in McDougal's schemes. The fact that they appear to have lost money on Whitewater, and were never convicted of any criminal behavior in connection with the scandal, hardly excuses this farcical round-robin of ethical conflicts.

4 Their escape from the Whitewater morass is all the more striking when you consider what happened to the other participants. Jim McDougal was convicted of eighteen counts of felony fraud and conspiracy in connection with rotten Madison Guaranty loans; his wife, Susan McDougal, served eighteen months in prison for refusing to testify about the scandal, before receiving a presidential pardon from Bill; and even Bill's successor as Arkansas governor, Jim Guy Tucker, was sentenced to four years on Whitewater-related conspiracy and mail-fraud charges.

Yet Whitewater itself is of far less interest than how Hillary handled it: with lies, half-truths, and secrecy. She initially claimed during the 1992 campaign that she hadn't represented clients before state regulators. She then backpedaled and said that she had "tried to avoid such involvement and cannot recall any instance other than the Madison Guaranty matter in which I had any involvement, and my involvement there was minimal." In fact, Madison wasn't the only instance. Another was the Southern Development Bancorporation, which paid Rose more than $100,000 in fees and received $300,000 in state investments.

5 Longtime readers of this magazine may recall "Fool for Scandal," a 1994 report in which Gene Lyons demolished much of the accepted wisdom about what he called the "Great Whitewater Political Scandal and Multimedia Extravaganza." Lyons makes a convincing case that Bill did not lean on the Arkansas Securities Commission to treat his friend and business partner with kid gloves. But in discussing Hillary's legal representation of McDougal's enterprise, even Lyons grows uneasy: "For Hillary Rodham Clinton to have ventured anywhere near Madison in any capacity was a damn fool thing to do."

Hillary also claimed the Rose billing records for the Madison case, which were under multiple subpoenas, had disappeared. Then they suddenly reappeared, discovered by a personal assistant in a room in the residential quarters of the White House. When asked about this mysterious turn of events, Hillary responded as if she, too, were an injured party: "I, like everyone else, would like to know the answer about how those documents showed up after all these years." The records showed that far from having a trivial role in representing Madison, she had actually billed for sixty hours of work.

Although it's been more than thirteen years since the Clintons left the White House, it's amazing how little there is to say about Hillary's subsequent career. If she was going to follow through on the eight-of-Bill-eight-of-Hill plan, she certainly needed a new political perch. Despite never having lived in New York — or, according to Dick Morris, ever having shown the slightest interest in the city or state — she decided to run for the Senate seat that Daniel Moynihan was vacating in 2000.

Hillary was plainly a carpetbagger. One way she fought that perception was by engaging in a "listening tour" early in her candidacy, crisscrossing the state that she barely knew, learning its physical and social geography, and trying to convince voters that she cared. But listening wasn't the point — flattering voters was. As Elizabeth Kolbert wrote in The New Yorker, "Here was a woman who could be doing anything, and what she wanted to do was to expand broadband access in Cattaraugus County."

6 What makes the book strange is its central (and now counterfactual) argument: The only thing that will stop Hillary's inevitable march to the presidency in 2008 is a Condoleezza Rice candidacy. Morris assured me that I would find the list of Hillary's accomplishments "adorable."

And that was precisely the sort of issue that Hillary focused on after winning the election. In Condi vs. Hillary (2005), a strange book that Dick Morris wrote with his wife, Eileen McGann, there's a list of her senatorial accomplishments.6 Drawing on Library of Congress records, the authors report that Hillary passed a total of twenty bills during her first five years in the Senate. Fifteen of them were purely symbolic: supporting Better Hearing and Speech Month, honoring Alexander Hamilton on the bicentennial of his death, congratulating the Le Moyne College men's lacrosse team on a big win. Others encouraged the use of electric cars or high-efficiency lightbulbs.

Granted, this is the stuff of retail politics. But what of her more substantive legislative achievements? One of these, allegedly, is the passage of something called the Nurse Retention and Quality of Care Act, which she cosponsored with the Oregon Republican Gordon Smith. But a Senate staffer told Morris that the bill was going to pass anyway, and that to claim Hillary "was instrumental in passing it is pure puff." There was also legislation extending unemployment benefits for victims of 9/11 (what New York senator wouldn't have pushed for something like that?). And according to Steven Brill's exhaustive After: The Rebuilding and Defending of America in the September 12 Era, it was the state's senior senator, Chuck Schumer, who did most of the heavy lifting on those bills.

What Hillary did do was make friends with her Republican colleagues. While ideologically dubious, it did have the long-term benefit of softening potential opposition to her future campaigns for the presidency. As Daniel Halper (a smart, nonrabid conservative) writes in his recent book Clinton, Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine:

I spoke to many, if not all, of Senator Clinton's biggest opponents within the Republican Party during her time as First Lady. On or off the record, no matter how much they were coaxed, not one of them would say a negative thing about Hillary Clinton as a person — other than observing that her Democratic allies sometimes didn't like her.

She buddied up to John McCain and attended prayer breakfasts with right-wingers like Sam Brownback of Kansas. She befriended Republicans who had served as floor managers of her husband's impeachment. Even Newt Gingrich has good things to say about her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Oh, and she voted for the Iraq war, and continued to defend it long after others had thrown in the towel. She cast that vote without having read the full National Intelligence Estimate, which was far more skeptical about Iraq's armaments than the bowdlerized version that was made public — strange behavior for someone as disciplined and thorough as Hillary. She also accused Saddam Hussein of having ties to Al Qaeda, which was closer to the Bush line than even many pro-war Democrats were willing to go. Alas, of all her senatorial accomplishments, this one arguably had the biggest impact. The rest were the legislative equivalent of being against breast cancer.

There was the debacle of 2008, in the course of which she squandered an initial two-to-one lead over her closest opponent for the Democratic nomination. And there was her ascension, once the hopey, changey tidal wave put Obama in the White House, to secretary of state. To be fair to Hillary, Obama never allowed her much power in that post. An unnamed "former high-ranking diplomat" told Halper that the president "brought her into the administration, put her in a bubble, and ignored her." Foreign policy was run mostly out of the White House by people with little experience in the area, and Obama, fearful of appearing soft, often deferred to military and intelligence personnel.

For her own part, Hillary was less of a diplomat and more of a hawk, who had made a campaign-trail promise in 2008 to "totally obliterate" Iran in the event of an attack on Israel. Part of this may have been pure temperament, or an impulse to prove that she was tougher than a man. But she may also have been reacting against public perception of the job itself. As the feminist scholar Cynthia Enloe, who specializes in gender and militarism, told me in a 2004 interview, there's a "long history of trying to feminize the State Department in American inner circles." Diplomats are caricatured as upper-class pansies instead of manly warriors. Bush, Cheney, and Rumsfeld even attempted to feminize Colin Powell, she argued, "which is pretty hard to do with somebody who has been a general."

But the problem becomes particularly acute with a female secretary of state — and Hillary countered it with a macho eagerness to call in the U.S. Cavalry. She backed an escalation of the Afghanistan war, lobbied on behalf of a continuing military presence in Iraq, urged Obama to bomb Syria, and supported the intervention in Libya. As Michael Crowley wrote in Time, "On at least three crucial issues — Afghanistan, Libya, and the bin Laden raid — Clinton took a more aggressive line than [Defense Secretary Robert] Gates, a Bush-appointed Republican."

On the other hand, Hillary and her backers might well stress her skimpy résumé as a peacemaker. Correct the Record, a pro-Hillary PR organization also run by David Brock, informs visitors on its website that she traveled 956,733 miles as secretary of state. This fact then links to a list of her accomplishments at the State Department. For instance, she helped to restore America's "leadership and standing in the world," though the only metrics offered to support this are the miles logged and meetings taken with "foreign leaders in 112 countries." She worked to avoid all-out war in Gaza (oops) and developed the "pivot to Asia" strategy, which "will probably be Obama's most lasting strategic achievement" (though it would be hard to describe just what that is). She negotiated free-trade pacts with Colombia and South Korea, despite her newfound reservations about NAFTA during the 2008 campaign. She elevated the cause of women's rights — which is entirely laudable, but seems to have had little impact in what the website refers to as "deeply reactionary cultures."

Since leaving the State Department, Hillary has devoted herself to what we can only call (echoing Halper's title) Clinton, Inc. This fund-raising, favor-dispensing machine is key to understanding her joint enterprise with Bill. Unlike the Bush family, an old-style WASP dynasty for all W.'s populist bluster and blunder, the Clintons are arrivistes who approach politics in a highly neoliberal manner. That means nonstop self-promotion, huge book advances, and fat speaking fees (Hillary has now joined Bill in the six-figure club). It means the various Clinton foundations, which were led first by Bill, but now include Hillary and Chelsea. According to a Wall Street Journal investigation, they've collectively raised between $2 and $3 billion since 1992, three quarters of it from business interests, with finance the leading sector.

And with an eye to the presidency, Hillary has also kept up her line of neocon patter, while carefully separating herself from Obama. In a notorious interview with Jeffrey Goldberg, she declared her enthusiastic support for Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu and for Israel's pummeling of Gaza. She claimed that she's always been against Iran's right to enrich uranium (though in 2010 she actually said otherwise). Prominent neocons such as Robert Kagan and Max Boot have made supportive noises about Hillary — and with an isolationist wing rising within the Republican party, advocates of a countervailing “muscular” foreign policy might do considerably more as 2016 approaches.

When I spoke to Dick Morris, I asked him how Hillary would differentiate herself from Obama during the 2016 campaign. His prediction: She would say that her predecessor had outlined a beautiful vision, but now voters “need someone who can get things done.” He added that she would criticize Obama for not having armed the Syrians rebels earlier. Two weeks later, in her conversation with Goldberg, Hillary did exactly that, while also suggesting that the president was to blame for the rise of ISIL. (In a revoltingly laudatory Washington Post review of Henry Kissinger’s new book, Hillary distinguishes between the president’s first term, during which they “laid the foundation” for a new approach to international relations — and the “crises of the second term,” as if the world suddenly changed when she strolled out of the State Department.)

Morris’s record as a political fortune-teller is hardly unspotted (he predicted a landslide for Mitt Romney the last time around), and who knows what sort of long game this Fox-friendly Republican could be playing? For what it’s worth, though, he’s assigned Elizabeth Warren the same sort of spoiler role he gave to Condoleezza Rice in the 2008 contest. Morris told me that if the Massachusetts senator “or some genuine figure from the new populist left of the Democratic Party” were to challenge Hillary, “they could upend her in much the same way that Obama did in 2008.” Warren, meanwhile, swears she doesn’t want to run, even as Hillary dons the mantle of inevitability for the second time.

Eight years of Hill? Four, even? To borrow her anti-McCain jab from the 2008 Democratic convention: No way, no how!

Huffington Post: Here Are 5 Takeaways From The Harper's Anti-Clinton Story

By Sam Levine

October 19, 2014, 9:00 p.m. EDT

In the November issue of Harper’s magazine, Doug Henwood argues that Hillary Clinton, if elected president, would do little to assuage liberals' disappointment in President Barack Obama. This is how Henwood sums up the case for Hillary’s candidacy in 2016: “She has experience, she’s a woman, and it’s her turn.” But, he says, “it’s hard to find any political substance in her favor.”

Tracing Clinton’s life from her upbringing to her time at the State Department, Henwood portrays her as a pragmatic politician motivated more by ambition than by principle. Here are five key takeaways from Henwood’s piece:

1. Hillary Clinton didn’t do much during her time in the U.S. Senate.

Relying on records collected by former Clinton adviser Dick Morris, Henwood argues that the legislation Clinton passed during her first five years in the Senate had little substance. The vast majority of bills, according to Henwood, were purely symbolic or would have passed without Clinton’s support. Clinton did work to extend unemployment benefits for 9/11 responders, but Haywood cites Steven Brill's book, The Rebuilding and Defending of America in the September 12Era, to make the case that Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) was actually responsible for pushing the legislation through.

Even though she didn't have much of a legislative impact in the Senate, Clinton did spend a lot of time befriending Republicans like Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who could potentially support her in a presidential campaign, Henwood says.

Clinton's most substantial legislative accomplishment, Henwood says, is her support for the Iraq War. The rest of her accomplishments in the Senate "were the legislative equivalent of being against breast cancer."

2. Hillary Clinton is a hawk.

In addition to her support for the Iraq War, Henwood notes, Clinton also linked Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda. Such an accusation "was closer to the Bush line than even many pro-war Democrats were willing to go," he writes.

The article goes on to say that during her time at the State Department, Clinton had a "macho eagerness" to call in the U.S. cavalry in foreign affairs. Quoting Time writer Michael Crowley, Henwood writes that, "On at least three crucial issues -- Afghanistan, Libya, and the bin Laden raid -- Clinton took a more aggressive line than [Defense Secretary Robert] Gates, a Bush-appointed Republican."

3. Hillary Clinton is ambitious.

Shortly after Bill Clinton graduated Yale Law School, Hillary was already telling colleagues that he was going to be president. Henwood also says Clinton's private slogan for her and her husband was "eight years of Bill, eight years of Hill."

4. Hillary Clinton is not idealistic.

At Wellesley College, Clinton wrote her senior thesis on Saul Alinsky's community organizing tactics, but later found them to be "too idealistic and simplistic," according to Bill Clinton's biographer David Maraniss. In her thesis, Clinton doubted the effectiveness of welfare programs, writing that they "neither redeveloped poverty areas nor even catalyzed the poor into helping themselves." When Clinton turned down a job offer from Alinsky after college, Alinsky reportedly told her that she wouldn't change the world by going to law school. Clinton told him that she disagreed.

5. Hillary Clinton has no problem representing the rich.

When she worked for the Rose Law Firm in Arkansas, she represented business owners who were upset over a ballot measure in Little Rock pushed by community organizers that would have raised electricity rates on businesses and lowered them on residents. Clinton played a crucial part in developing the legal argument that the higher electricity rates would be an "unconstitutional taking of property," Henwood says, noting that similar arguments are now frequently used against regulation.

Des Moines Register: Sen. Warren raises the roof for Braley

By Kathie Obradovich

October 19, 2014 10:56 p.m. CDT

"Wow! Dynamite."

That was the assessment of longtime Iowa Democrat and Hillary Clinton supporter Bonnie Campbell after U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren delivered a fist-pumping call to action at today's rally for Bruce Braley.

Warren, a Massachusetts senator, packed venues in Iowa City and Des Moines today for Braley, who is running in a tight race for U.S. Senate. It was Warren's first campaign trip to Iowa of the 2014 cycle.

She has said repeatedly she's not running for president in 2016, but she noted Iowa's prominence in national politics.

"Iowa has led this country, time after time after time. You have put it on, you've raised the issues, you've put them out there, you've made it clear to the rest of America – what's happening, what's happening to our country, where our values are, how we build a future," she said.

Warren and Braley both told personal stories featuring hard-working parents who had to find ways to support the family after their bread-winning fathers suffered illness or injury. Warren's father had a serious heart attack and couldn't work for months, so her 50-year-old, stay-at-home mother went to work to save their house.

"She walked to the Sears Roebuck and got a minimum-wage job – in an America where a minimum-wage job would support a family of three," she said.

Braley said his father, a WW II Marine Corps veteran, was seriously injured in a fall at a grain elevator and was laid up for almost a year. "And without the safety net of workers compensation payments and friends and family that rallied to my family's support, we wouldn't have made it," he said. "And that's when I learned, you're only as strong as the people who you care about and what we do together matters."

Warren, known for her populist political values, outlined an agenda similar to Braley's: Raising the minimum wage and investing in education, infrastructure and scientific research. She said Republicans had undermined these investments over the years in order to cut taxes for the rich.

Of all of the political surrogates I've seen this cycle of either party, Warren was hands-down the best at firing up the room. "We can whine about what the Republicans have done. We can whimper about what they've done, or we can fight back. Me, I'm fighting back," she shouted, to thunderous cheers and chants in the audience.

She said the core issue in the race for U.S. Senate is: "Who does the government work for? Does it work just for the millionaires, just for the billionaires, just for those who have armies of lobbyists and lawyers, or does it work for the people?"

Iowa Democrats who plan to participate in the 2016 caucuses are overwhelmingly supporting Hillary Clinton as a prospective presidential candidate right now, according to the Register/Bloomberg Politics Iowa Poll.

Warren is not well-known among likely caucusgoers, but she is on their radar as a second choice. Judging from her performance in Iowa today, she'll have plenty of invitations from Iowa Democrats who want to share a stage with her in the future.

New York Magazine: Andrew Cuomo and the Terrible, Horrible, No Good, Very Bad Year

By Chris Smith

October 19, 2014 9:00 p.m. EDT

The phone is Andrew Cuomo's instrument. Somehow distance brings out the governor's full range of operatic inflections and rhetorical flourishes that he doesn't deploy effectively in person. Today, on the phone, three weeks from Election Day, cruising toward a second term, he is in full Rodney Dangerfield mode.

"I passed gay marriage! I passed the toughest gun law in the country! I closed more prison cells than any governor in the history of the state! Minority job vouchers! My record of progressive accomplishment tops anyone!" Pause, dramatic reduction in volume. "Now, do you have some voices on the left that are impossible to placate in any realistic way? Yeah … Ask yourself: If he were more liberal, he would have done what? What more could I have possibly done? You're gonna use the tax code just to take money from the rich and give it to the poor? That's not liberalism. That's confiscation! Liberalism was 'Lift up the poor' … The problem for liberals and progressives—of which I am proudly one—is you have to demonstrate you can actually do what you talk about. And that's what I've been doing. My government works."

Cuomo has a point. On balance, he's had a strong first term. The state has gone from a $10 billion deficit in 2010 to a projected $6 billion surplus. He's restored functionality, if not total rationality, to a state government that had become a national embarrassment. Cuomo has also poured money and attention into Buffalo, and the state's second-largest, formerly woebegone city is seeing fresh job growth. He has been opportunistic, pushing through tighter gun laws after the shootings in Sandy Hook and wrangling the legalization of gay marriage just two years after the State Legislature had rejected the idea by a fairly wide margin.

There have certainly been flaws. Cuomo is replacing the decrepit Tappan Zee Bridge without really explaining how he's going to pay for the new $4 billion spans. He's still stalling on a fracking decision. There have been tax cuts for corporations and spending cuts for social services. But the lack of enthusiasm for Cuomo, in both the citizenry and the political class, is as much about his muscular style as any substance. "Is he a son of a bitch at times? Yeah," one of the governor's Albany allies says. "He is a mechanic; he works on cars as a hobby, fixes engines. And in politics he moves the process forward. You don't love Andrew Cuomo. But there hasn't been a better governor, not in the last 50 years."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The current year, though, has been a rough one. He underestimated the anger of the state's left wing and the ability of the Working Families Party to marshal it against him—at least for a few embarrassing days in May. Then he ignored his Democratic primary challenger, Zephyr Teachout, who mounted a surprisingly robust, albeit unsuccessful, insurgency. Since winning the primary, Cuomo has barely campaigned, avoiding in-person debates with the Republican candidate, Rob Astorino. (He did agree to a radio debate.) Even if Astorino, or Teachout, was never a real threat, Cuomo's attitude toward the campaign has fueled the perception that he views himself as above the democratic process.

The fallout from his Moreland Commission machinations haven't helped. One of his loudest campaign promises four years ago was that he'd clean up corruption in Albany. In 2013, the governor empaneled the commission to investigate ethical violations in government, but his higher priority was using the commission as a subpoena-packing weapon to pressure the Legislature to pass stricter ethics laws. The move was classic Cuomo: ethically debatable tactics to achieve modestly higher ethical ends.

The governor insists that he'd declared from the outset that he'd shutter the commission when the Legislature passed an ethics bill, and that's true. In July, however, the Times detailed how Cuomo's aides meddled with Moreland's work, and U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara has been pursuing the leads the commission developed.

Maybe the successes of the first three years made Cuomo overconfident. Or maybe his bumpy 2014 was partly rooted in the growing realization that his shot at a 2016 presidential bid was slipping away. "Psychologically, the governor is a guy that's goal-oriented," a senior state Democrat says. "He would never admit it, but he'd been driven by positioning himself for president. Now that that's off the table, he's a little bit adrift."

Cuomo is far more complicated than that, though, and so are the circumstances. Holding back big new ideas until January, when the new legislative season starts, for instance, is a strategic choice. Not that he's promising any revelations. "I fundamentally intend to continue doing what I'm doing," he says. "Fiscal discipline and pushing the envelope on socially progressive issues … For me, the team comes out of the locker room for the second half, the team is ahead 21 to 0, what are you gonna do different in the second half? Very little."

Still, he seems to be casting about for a set of challenges worthy of his restless intensity for the next four—and maybe eight—years in Albany. After three years of travel avoidance bordering on the phobic, he will take "trade missions" to China, Mexico, Israel, Canada, and Italy. The publication, last week, of his autobiography also seems to have revived his energy. "Writing it was the hardest thing I've ever done," he says. "The editor, she said, 'You're writing it like a lawyer writes a legal brief, and it becomes a boring, sterile read.' She wanted more emotion and hyperbole and rhetoric. I said, 'Yeah, but in my business, if they can spin the language to mean something else, they will.' "

There's plenty of emotion at the mention of his antagonists. Cuomo is emphatic, if not especially convincing, that he didn't see Teachout standing right in front of him at a parade in September. "There was somebody between me and her. Look, I shook hands with that guy … uh, the lieutenant governor, Wu!" Cuomo says, referring to Tim Wu, who ran for that office in the primary. As for Teachout's surprising 34 percent? "That showing had nothing to do with her," he snaps. "In a very small-turnout election you have the [state] teachers union, which is against me, you have the public employees that are against me … and the fracking people, probably the largest single issue for activist Democrats, who are upset that I won't ban it."

The Times drives him crazy; he thinks its editorial board is obsessed with public financing of campaigns, a reform Cuomo says he supports, even though he's dubious that it has much relevance in the age of big-money independent-expenditure committees.

Not that he cares to dwell on some pesky liberal carping when he's got the whole state to worry about. Cuomo believes the center is still the most responsible place from which to govern New York—and the country, though he's merely an informed spectator on that front, of course. Aren't national politics increasingly polarized, with the right and the left wings setting the agendas for the Republicans and the Democrats? "That's always been true," Cuomo says, quickly warming to the subject. "But you're leaving out a big piece of history. Bill Clinton wins saying to the left of the party, 'You are unelectable.' Bill Clinton gives a speech saying, 'Mario Cuomo, Dukakis, Ted Kennedy are the politics of a failed Democratic Party.' Bill Clinton does Sister Souljah, puts his finger in the chest of Jesse Jackson. That was after a period of left dominance. Clinton is then centrist-moderate-left, right? Sort of tacks back and forth between the two. Where is the national Democratic Party now? Well, they're talking about Hillary Clinton. Her last name is Clinton, which represented that centrist-left platform. So I think that's where the party is nationwide. And the Clinton philosophy is still a winning philosophy."

Ah, the multiple psychodramas embedded in that single paragraph. Cuomo, though, sounds more relaxed than usual, claiming he's content ruling New York for the foreseeable future. "I am so happy that I got to do what I'm doing. This is a gift," he says. "I want a great record. That's what I want. That's what matters. When you're dead politically—and I've been dead politically, and I saw my father dead politically—what matters is what you got done."

Saudi King due in White House for Nuclear Deal Talks

The Obama administration is greeting King Salman of Saudi Arabia with assurances that a nuclear deal with Iran also comes with the necessary resources to help check its regional ambitions. The king is making his first visit to the White House since ascending the throne in January. The visit on Friday comes at an important moment. Saudi officials have voiced support for the deal, but they are also worried about the international communities' ability to enforce it. The visit is pushing the administration to publicly address those concerns before Congress votes.

Democratic Support Piles up for Deal in Senate

Now a done deal, the Iran nuclear agreement gained critical backing from three more Democratic senators Thursday, boosting White House hopes of blocking a disapproval resolution in the Senate so the president won't have to veto it. Democratic Sens. Cory Booker of New Jersey, Mark Warner of Virginia and Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota announced their support in quick succession for the deal that aims to curb Iran's nuclear program in exchange for wide relief from economic sanctions. The announcement from Booker, in particular, was closely watched because he was under immense pressure from segments of the Jewish community in New Jersey to oppose the deal, and New Jersey's other Democratic senator, Bob Menendez, is an outspoken opponent.

5 American Tourists Attacked in Hebron

Five American yeshiva students were attacked with rocks and firebombs, setting their car on fire after accidentally entering Hebron Thursday night. Two of the students were lightly to moderately wounded in the incident and were treated on the scene when security forces arrived in the area to bring them to safety. A local resident, Fayez Abu Hamdia, sheltered the five in his home until they were evacuated by IDF troops who arrived in the area. "I'm not a hero," Abu Hamdia told Ynet. "I did what needed to be done."

Settlers to Hold Rally near Pal. Village

Right-wing activists and settlers plan to stage a protest today on the outskirts of the Nabi Saleh village, 20 km. northwest of Ramallah, to counter the weekly Palestinian demonstrations held there. Led by Beit Aryeh Council head Avi Naim, the group will gather at the entrance to the Neveh Tzuf settlement, otherwise known as Halamish, which is located just across the road from Nabi Saleh. Naim said he was inspired to hold the rally in support of soldiers after he saw a video that went viral from last Friday's demonstration in which women and children from Nabi Saleh attack a soldier as he tried to arrest 11-year-old Muhammad Tamimi, whose left arm was visibly in a cast. The video shows a partially masked soldier with one hand on a rifle and another on the neck of a terrified-looking boy.

Hamas Praises Corbyn's Support for Pal. Struggle

Hamas has reportedly praised the British Labour Party's leadership frontrunner Jeremy Corbyn for his "sympathetic" position on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. According to an interview in The Telegraph with Hamas Deputy Foreign Minister Ghazi Hamad, senior officials in the Palestinian Islamist organization called Corbyn's oft-controversial stance a welcome change from British leaders past, who allegedly hold a pro-Israel bias. "I find that he has very good sympathy and support for the Palestinian cause and the Palestinian struggle and he is frankly against the occupation, against the racist policy of Israel, against settlements," Hamad said. "If he really became the head of the Labour party, he can make a big change to the image of Britain because people here in Palestine feel that Britain has a historical responsibility, in giving Israel the golden chance of establishing their state on the account of the Palestinian people," Hamad added, referring to Britain's role in the State of Israel's establishment.

Report: Israel Refuels Jordanian Jets During Exercise

Ten Israeli F-15 fighters recently concluded a joint exercise at an American air force base with the air forces of the United States, Singapore and Jordan. The Israeli planes refueled in mid-air several times en route from Israel to the Red Flag exercise at the Nellis air force base in Nevada. According to the aviation website Foxtrot Alpha, the Israeli contingent also provided the Jordanian fighters with mid-air refueling en route. The head of the air force's training division, Col. Uri, refused to confirm or deny Foxtrot Alpha's report. But in a briefing for military reporters, he stressed that there was "nothing connected to operational planning" in the mid-air refueling; it was "merely mission planning for the sortie to the United States."

German politician: Israel's Fence is Worse than Berlin Wall

Israeli organizations slammed Green Party Bundestag deputy Uwe Kekeritz on Thursday for claiming that Israel's security barrier and border system designed to stop Palestinian terrorism is worse than the Berlin Wall. In comparison with Israel's borders, the Berlin Wall was "a toy," Bavarian politician Kekeritz claimed in the course of a nearly four-minute video posted to YouTube in mid-August. He spoke at an anti-Israel event in early June, at "Protestant Church Day" in Stuttgart. Efraim Zuroff, the chief Nazi-hunter of the Simon Wiesenthal Center and the director of its Jerusalem office, told The Jerusalem Post on Thursday: "It is obvious that Green MP Uwe Kekeritz learned nothing about the larger picture of Middle East politics and history during his visit to Israel" last year. "To the best of my knowledge, the Berlin Wall was not built to stop terrorists from committing suicide attacks against West Berlin civilians," he said.

Benjamin Netanyahu Faces a Stark Dilemma in the Iran Nuclear Deal

By David Ignatius

What does Israel do now that President Obama has won the congressional votes needed to implement an Iran nuclear agreement that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu described as "a stunning historic mistake"?

This was always the danger of Netanyahu's unyielding rhetorical stand against the Iran deal and his politically divisive campaign to block it in Congress: What if he failed? Would the Israeli leader try to rebuild bipartisan relations in Washington, or would he double-down once again, by encouraging Republican presidential candidates to repudiate the deal if elected?

We don't know Netanyahu's answer yet, but that's the stark dilemma he faces, after Obama this week pinned down the 34 Senate votes needed to sustain a veto of legislation rejecting the Iran deal. Obama played for keeps on what he views as the most important foreign policy issue of his presidency — and he won.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There wasn't a lot of high-fiving or backslapping here," a senior administration official said. For all the hype surrounding the Senate vote count, it has been clear for weeks that the House had a comfortable margin to block any override of a veto. "A lot of the drama was fictionalized," the official said. "Everyone knew how this would end."

Obama's campaign picked up momentum after he made pledges to some key pro-Israel Democrats. In an Aug. 19 letter to Rep. Jerrold Nadler (N.Y.), Obama promised that "should Iran seek to dash toward a nuclear weapon," the military option would "remain available." In a letter dated Tuesday to Sen. Chris Coons (Del.), Obama pledged interdiction of weapons shipments to Iranian-backed groups such as Hezbollah, along with other measures aimed at "countering Iran's asymmetric threat to the region." Sen. Bob Casey (Pa.) gained quiet assurances that Iran's covert actions would be countered in like manner.

But Robert Satloff, executive director of the pro-Israel Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said that the White House's outreach was more show than substance. "The bottom line is that the administration gave zero," Satloff said in an interview. "It was a lot of nice verbiage, a lot of conditional verbs and adjectives, but they didn't fix any of the flaws in the agreement."

Netanyahu's aides are now saying that they "never really believed they could stop the deal in Congress — they only wanted to alert the world how dangerous Iran is," according to a report Thursday by The Post's William Booth in Jerusalem. But that makes it all the more puzzling why Netanyahu waged his scorched-earth campaign and what he will do now to recover.

Dennis Ross, a former administration official who knows Israeli leaders well, said in an interview that Netanyahu probably hasn't decided on the best strategy. Ross said that many Israeli military leaders are urging the prime minister to begin working on a joint U.S.-Israeli strategy based on the deal's premise that Iran's nuclear program will indeed be frozen for 15 years. "How do you take advantage of those 15 years?" Ross asked.

But having walked so far out on a limb, the Israeli leader may not be ready to retreat toward pragmatism yet — at least not publicly. Pro-Israel lobbying groups such as the American Israel Public Affairs Committee may hope to mend fences with Democratic members of Congress and restore bipartisan support for Israel, but hard-line Republicans, such as wealthy casino owner and campaign contributor Sheldon Adelson, may want to push partisan politics even further — toward a realignment that portrays the GOP as Israel's only reliable friend.

"Netanyahu doesn't want to validate the Iran agreement," Satloff said. "The Israelis weren't at the table, and they aren't bound by what was agreed." At the same time, he predicts that Netanyahu will gradually move to consolidate joint U.S.-Israeli deterrence measures against Iran.

Obama was criticized, even by some of his closest political allies, for what the administration official described as "being too alienating or strident in our tone," especially in his speech last month at American University. Now that he has won the votes, Obama can think about the real challenge ahead — which is successful implementation of the Iran pact, whether Netanyahu likes it or not.

Bibi's Two-State Solution: State of Israel and State of the Jews

By Akiva Eldar

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There were times when such an announcement by the leader of a right-wing Israeli government would have made front-page headlines: "I am ready now to go to Ramallah or any other place to meet and hold direct negotiations." This, according to an announcement issued by the prime minister's office, is what Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told representatives of Women Wage Peace on Sept. 1. The prime minister even asked his guests, should they meet with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, to convey him the message that he was willing to renew direct negotiations with him.

There were times when the words "the solution is two states for two people" would have spoiled the media festival over the opening of the school year for Education Minister Naftali Bennett, head of the HaBayit HaYehudi Party and Netanyahu's coalition partner. On the left, no one even bothered issuing a reaction to the obvious contradiction between the prime minister's willingness to launch negotiations "without preconditions," and the unrealistic condition that he stated in the same breath at that meeting, according to which the Palestinian state would recognize Israel as "the national state of the Jewish people." And, of course, not a word about a freeze on settlement building in the West Bank.

Politicians, like the news editors who ignored the announcement, know full well that the chances of Abbas inviting Netanyahu to the Muqata, the Palestinian Authority headquarters, to conduct negotiations on a peace agreement are akin to the chances of US President Barack Obama inviting him to the White House to discuss the nuclear deal with Iran. Coincidentally — or perhaps not so coincidentally — the announcement about the meeting with the peace activists was issued by the prime minister's office almost at the same time as the Palestinian news agency Ma'an reported that Abbas had declared he was stepping down from the leadership of all PLO institutions.

The announcement on Abbas' behalf was made at a meeting of the Fatah central committee, ahead of the Palestinian National Council meeting being convened in Ramallah at the end of next week. Mohammed al-Madani, a member of the Fatah central committee and a close Abbas associate, said the next day that the move was designed to capture the attention of the dormant United States and European Union, and to pass on to them the following message: "I don't want to hold onto a job that has become a kind of security doorkeeper for Israel, and anyone who wants to assume responsibility is welcome to do so." Madani also noted that Abbas had even told Jordan's King Abdullah during their meeting Aug. 30 that he was considering an announcement at the UN General Assembly at the end of September saying he has no interest in heading an authority devoid of sovereignty. So what interest could he have in shaking Netanyahu's empty hands?

According to a senior US official who spoke on condition of anonymity, Washington is well aware of Abbas' position, his advanced age and the battles of succession paralyzing the Palestinian leadership in the West Bank. The Americans, as well as the Europeans, know that former British Prime Minister and retired Quartet envoy Tony Blair does not have any real news for residents of the Gaza Strip, despite the contacts he is leading between Hamas and Israel. The official denial issued by Netanyahu's office on this matter was designed to refute rumors that Blair had been authorized by the prime minister to discuss a package deal, which includes a cease-fire and a lifting of the Israeli blockade on Gaza. According to reliable information that Al-Monitor received, the denial is more credible than the rumor.

The battles for succession, which are expected to heat up on the day following Abbas' resignation, could deteriorate into violence and undermine Palestinian security coordination with Israel. Absent any hope of throwing off the humiliating yoke of occupation and the painful pinch of the blockade, a single pyromaniac infiltrating the bubbling Temple Mount (Haram al-Sharif) complex could provide the spark that would blow up the powder keg. A conflagration in the territories risks overshadowing the nuclear agreement with Iran — the most important legacy of Obama.

According to the senior American, the previous attempt that ended with a "poof," as described by US Secretary of State John Kerry, doused any desire to send him to spend his remaining days at the State Department in yet another futile round of shuttle diplomacy between Jerusalem and Ramallah. Anyone burned once by the Israeli-Palestinian hot potato is careful not to go near it again. It's better to dump it on the plate of the next president. Republican President Ronald Reagan, who was considered a "friend of Israel," gave an official seal of approval to the PLO, over Israel's objections and fury. He did so during the transition in December 1988, after George H.W. Bush was elected president but before he took office. Obama the Democrat, who in any case is considered — unjustifiably so — an "Israel hater," is thinking of upgrading the head of the PLO to head of state status a little over a year before the end of his second term.

A draft resolution agreed upon by members of the Quartet (the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia), which would be presented to the UN Security Council, would replace Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. It would serve as a framework and source of authority for negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. The new resolution would include recognition of an independent Palestinian state within the 1967 borders with agreed-upon amendments of the border lines, and express the Jewish identity of the State of Israel. The Obama administration assumes that neither side will jump with joy at UN headquarters and whip out its pen to sign a comprehensive peace agreement. This challenge, or headache, of creating arrangements in Jerusalem and a solution to the refugee problem will provide a full-time job for the next administration.

The final agreement about this hot issue will be made after the Iran nuclear saga clears the US Congress at the end of the month. It's safe to assume that Obama is taking into account that candidates for the Republican presidential nomination will launch a mudslinging competition against the decision to recognize Palestine "unilaterally," and will accuse the president of a last-minute grab. Jewish organizations are likely to pressure the Democratic contenders to distance themselves publicly from such a move. Behind closed doors they will thank Obama, who not only reduced the threat of a nuclear war in the Middle East but also opened the door to prospects of a peace arrangement of sorts in the region. Until then we will rejoice that Netanyahu deigned to hold a publicized meeting with the Women Wage Peace activists who had fasted outside his residence for 50 days to observe the first anniversary of Operation Protective Edge (July-August 2014). We will console ourselves with tall tales about a prime minister willing to travel to Ramallah to promote the two-state solution: the State of Israel and the State of the Jews.

Dear Jake and John:

I'm sending this to you at the suggestion of my friend Lorraine Hariton. By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.

Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.

Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

I'm writing a book about my 50 year journey to make Wrinkle into a movie and have been doing research on the past 5 decades which moved me to write this note to Lorraine this morning.

Lorraine-

Just wanted to send along a few thoughts re today's Post story on HRC. First, hope you are enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, "politics as usual' is immediately heard as "politics as usual in Clinton-world."

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words ‘politics as usual’ it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson’s War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon’s ‘silent majority,’ -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women’s rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

“The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which “brings us together in a peaceful loving state.”

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking’s insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Country. Service. Action.

John -

Since we started our campaign to elevate the voices of veterans who support a diplomacy-first approach with Iran, over 20,000 men and women who have worn our country's uniform have added their names in support.

Today, I want to share a few of their stories with you, and to let you know that in the next few weeks, we're going to be flying almost two dozen veterans and military family members out the nation's capital to make their voices heard loud and clear.

Contribute $3 to help VoteVets bring these veterans to Washington, D.C. to lobby the Democratic representatives we need to hold the line ahead of the vote on the Iran deal later this month.

Dennis, an Operation Enduring Freedom Veteran (Afghanistan) wrote in that "The alternative is an eventual war, again, in the Middle East."

Matt, an Iraq War Veteran from Colorado added, "Based on my experience in Iraq, I feel that diplomacy is a better path than military action in southwest Asia ... Voting [against] the nuclear treaty with Iran would perpetuate our involvement in the region and likely lead to the next generation of our military being worn out in the region."

Kevin, also an Iraq War Veteran says, "Diplomacy should always be the 1st option. It's the best option. War is a last resort. With Iraq it was the 1st choice. 4500 Americans and countless Iraqis died for WMD's that didn't exist."

We're going to bring veterans who have served overseas - people like Dennis, Matt, and Kevin - to tell their legislators how their experiences in war inform their desire for America to reach for a peaceful way to disabuse Iran of their nuclear ambitions.

Contribute $3 today to help us bring them to Washington, D.C. to share their stories.

We received thousands of letters like theirs. Letters from veterans who served in Afghanistan, Iraq, Korea, Vietnam, and more -- generations of combat veterans who wrote in support of the deal.

Congress needs to understand their perspective. Thanks for helping us make their voices heard.

Subject:	[big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-Why Resolution on Chemical Weapons is Completely Different from Iraq War Resolution

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/robert-creamer/why-the-congressional-res_b_3873036.html

Why the Congressional Resolution on Chemical Weapons Is Completely Different From Iraq War Resolution

There has been a lot said in the last week comparing the Congressional resolution authorizing the use of force to punish Bashar al Assad's government for using chemical weapons to the resolution authorizing the Iraq War. Nothing could be further from the truth.

As an ardent opponent of the Iraq War resolution, I am proud to say that 60% of the Democrats in the House of Representatives voted against authorizing the Iraq War. Today, I support the resolution authorizing force to sanction the use of chemical weapons in Syria.

There are five major differences between the current resolution and the one that authorized the Iraq War:

1). The President is asking for a narrow authorization that the U.S. exact a near-term military price for Assad's use of chemical weapons. He is not asking for a declaration of War – which is exactly what George Bush asked from Congress in Iraq.

George Bush sent thousands of U.S. troops to overthrow the government and then occupy Iraq. He spent what will ultimately be trillions of dollars to overthrow the Iraqi regime and then conduct a 10-year campaign to pacify the country.

The President's proposal to Congress is not intended to overthrow the government of Syria. And it certainly does not involve conducting an American war against Syria. This is not an action that the President would have contemplated absent the use of chemical weapons. This resolution is intended entirely to make the Assad regime pay a price for their violation of a 100-year international consensus that the use of chemical weapons is unacceptable in the civilized world.

Some have argued that killing people with chemical weapons is no worse than killing them with a gun or a bomb. Both are horrible. But the difference that created a worldwide consensus against their use is that they are weapons of mass destruction. Like biological and nuclear weapons they are distinguished by two characteristics that would make their regular use much more dangerous for the future of humanity than guns and bombs:

They can kill massive numbers of people very quickly.
They are completely indiscriminant. They kill everything in their path. They do not discriminate between combatant and non-combatants – between children and adults.

Those two characteristics make weapons of mass destruction different from other weapons. In the interest of our survival as a species we must make the use of all weapons of mass destruction unthinkable. That must be one of humanity's chief goals if it is to survive into the next century.

There has been talk about "other options" to punish Assad and deter him from using chemical weapons in the future. But the fact is that the only price that matters to Assad – or to anyone who is in the midst of a military struggle – is a military price.

There is a worldwide consensus that no matter how desperate someone's military situation, the use of chemical weapons in specific – and weapons of mass destruction in general -- is never justified.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When combatants are in the midst of a military struggle, they don't really care about their "reputation" or even the economy of their country. They care about their military situation.

That is not true of countries like Iran or any other country that is not at war. Economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure are important levers on most countries and governments – but not governments in the midst of military battles that threaten their survival.

As a result, to reduce the likelihood that an actor like Assad will use chemical weapons again, he has to experience a military sanction – the degradation of his military capacity – because at the moment, that's all he cares about. I'm sure Assad would be happy to worry about whether he is indicted by the International Criminal Court, or the state of the Syrian economy at some time in the distant future. Right now he cares about his military capacity.

If we do nothing, the odds massively increase that he will use chemical weapons again, because he knows that they work to kill huge numbers of his opponents – and that he can do so with impunity. That would be a disastrous setback for humanity's critical priority of banning the use of weapons of mass destruction – weapons that could easily threaten our very existence.

2). The resolution on chemical weapons explicitly limits the authorization to 90 days. The resolution on Iraq was unlimited – and resulted in a conflict lasting over a decade.

Opponents have questioned whether short-term air strikes could be effective at substantially degrading Assad's chemical weapons infrastructure. There is no guarantee. But there is some precedent for believing they can. As Walter Pincus wrote in today's Washington Post:

…the precedent worth recalling is Operation Desert Fox in December 1998, in which the Clinton Administration went after Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's facilities for weapons of mass destruction over four days.

Although the operation almost immediately faded from the American public's mind because it was followed quickly by the House impeachment debate, it did destroy Iraq's WMD infrastructure, as the Bush administration later discovered.

3). The resolution on Iraq was based on faulty – actually fabricated – intelligence about the supposed presence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Those "intelligence" assessments turned out to be totally untrue – much of it manufactured.

The resolution on chemical weapons is not based on anyone's estimate of the likelihood that Assad has weapons of mass destruction. It is based on their actual use – recorded and widely distributed on video – and intercepts that document the orders for their deployment.

4). The Iraq War Resolution involved the commitment of American troops – on the ground – where thousands of them died and thousands more were maimed. This resolution explicitly precludes American troops on the ground in Syria.

5). President George Bush, Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld and their entire team wanted to invade Iraq. The Neocons desperately wanted to finish what they started with Desert Storm. They had an imperial vision of America's role in the world that involved American domination of the Middle East through the projection of military power. That vision turned into the nightmare in Iraq. Iraq became one of the great foreign policy disasters of all time.

President Obama and his team have exactly the opposite goal. The team is composed of people who opposed the War in Iraq – and the Neocon world-view -- including the President who was against the War in Iraq from the first day.

He has been very explicit that his aim is to end America's wars in the Middle East – not to begin another.

Bush and his team used the false specter that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction – and was behind the 9/11 attacks – to drive America into a war that had nothing to do with either.

On the contrary, President Obama is motivated entirely by his goal of enforcing the international consensus against using chemical weapons – not starting a war. In fact, he has done everything in his power for two years to avoid America's military involvement in the Syrian civil war.

Some have argued that those who opposed the Iraq War Resolution, but support the President's proposal, would have opposed a similar resolution if it had been presented by George Bush. And the answer is yes, that is clearly a factor. The motivations and world-view of the people you are empowering to use military force should matter a great deal. The fact is that while Bush and the Neocons might have tried to use a resolution to start a long war – the Obama team will not.

Progressive may differ on whether using military action to sanction Assad is the correct course of action for the United States. But the argument that Obama's proposal to use military means to sanction the use of chemical weapons by Assad is analogous to the Bush's rush to war in Iraq is just plain wrong.

2015.02.24 Lead On: First Annual Watermark Silicon Valley Conference for Women Keynote in Santa Clara, CA

SEC. CLINTON: Hello. Wow, what an amazing crowd. It's great to be here. Thank you all so much, thank you, thank you. I want to thank Renee for her introduction, but more than that I want to thank her for what Intel is doing that she just described, and I hope that more companies will join with her and with Intel to really elevate this issue about diversity and inclusivity in the workforce here in Silicon Valley and literally around our country. I want to thank everyone at Watermark for organizing this terrific gathering and supporting such a vibrant, visionary community of women leaders here in the Bay Area, because you could just feel the energy. I love it. I was watching backstage when Renee Brown was speaking, isn't she amazing, and the work that she's done, and the insight she provides? So for 20 years, Watermark has been helping people, women, grow networks, gain skills, crack ceilings in technology, entrepreneurship, and beyond.

So really, it's all of you who should be applauded for being part of this movement, and I am delighted that I can be here for this first Lead On Conference. It's a great theme, and a very important one, because we do need to lead. We have the information, we understand the challenge, and if there's any place in the world where Lead On should be happening, it's right [2:00] here, in a place of big dreams and transformational achievements, where a kid can have a good idea and then build a billion-dollar company in a place where faith in the future is so strong that it's taken as a given. In fact, you all know Moore's Law: computer processors will keep doubling in power roughly every two years. Well, there's something very American about that kind of optimism. After all, our country is a great entrepreneurial experiment. Families like my grandparents who came to our shores with nothing but hope and a willingness to work hard. The pioneers who set out for California by wagon train. The patriots who dared imagine that a new nation could be built on the novel proposition that all of us are created equal. And even though it's taken centuries to turn that idea into reality, and we're still not there, those dreamers and doers would have been right at home here because the innovation and success we see around us is proof that progress is possible, but also that it is not inevitable. Not in a life, not in a country. After all, Moore's Law doesn't tell the whole story. Those processors don't get smaller and more powerful on their own. That takes incredible effort and ingenuity. It takes people not only working hard but working together. And America's prosperity and security are not inevitable, either. We've learned that we can bounce back from some pretty tough blows, so we know that progress is [4:00] possible if we as a country harness all our talents, find the best and freshest ideas no matter where they come from, and grow together, lift each other up.

Today, I want to focus briefly on two areas where you know and I know there is much more work to be done: women and technology, and technology and our broader economy. Now, many of you in this audience know far more about those two areas than I do, or ever will. You live it every day. You bump your heads on the glass ceilings that persist in the tech industry. You watch too many of our daughters and granddaughters get diverted away from careers in STEM. As familiar as this story is, and we heard Renee summarizing it as she made the announcement about what Intel will try to do, it is still shocking. The numbers are sobering. On the Forbes list of the top 100 venture investors in tech, only four are women. Just 11 percent of executives in Silicon Valley and only about 20 percent of software developers overall are women. One recent report on the gender pay gap in the Valley found that a woman with a bachelor's degree here tends to make 60 percent less than a man with the same degree. And we can literally count on one hand the number of women who have actually been able to come here and turn their dreams into billion-dollar businesses. And think of this. While nearly 60 percent of college graduates are now women, they earn only 18 percent of the computer science [6:00] degrees. That's actually less than half of what it was in the 1980s, when women earned 38 percent of those degrees. We are going backwards in a field that is supposed to be all about moving forward. Women and girls remain underrepresented in STEM education more broadly, and with STEM jobs growing faster and paying more than many other fields, this puts our daughters and granddaughters at a disadvantage that can have lasting consequences for them, their families, and, yes, our economy. I think the bottom line here is we cannot afford to leave all that talent sitting on the sidelines. So to borrow a familiar phrase, it's time to think different. All of us – in the private sector, government, the nonprofit world, and education – we all have a stake in making this better, from the classroom to the boardroom. I love the way Watermark supports a class at Stanford's business school focused on women's entrepreneurship. I really appreciated when Google became the first big tech company to disclose the demographics of its tech workforce: 83 percent male, 17 percent female, 2 percent Latino, 1 percent black.

So there's a lot of entry points into tackling this problem. At the Clinton Foundation, we're working with partners to recruit more STEM teachers for schools. We've also organized a series of Codeathons to bring together young women software engineers to collaborate on new apps to promote women's health and wellness, while also [8:00] building new professional networks for themselves. And many of you are involved in other efforts to open avenues for women and people of color to participate and succeed in this industry, and we have to keep that work going and growing, because inclusivity is more than a buzzword or a box to check; it is a recipe for success in the 21st century. Bringing different perspectives and life experiences into corporate offices, engineering labs, and venture funds is likely to bring fresh ideas and higher revenues. And in our increasingly multicultural country, in an increasingly interdependent world, building a more diverse talent pool can't just be a nice-to-do for business; it has to be a must-do.

Now of course, the challenges we're talking about are by no means limited to the tech fields. Less than 5 percent of all Fortune 500 CEOs are women, and women entrepreneurs often have a much harder time accessing capital to start or grow a business. Up and down the ladder, many women are paid less for the same work, which is why I think we all cheered at Patricia Arquette's speech at the Oscars. Because she's right: it's time to have wage equality once and for all. But it's not just wage equality. Many working parents all too often don't have access to common sense benefits like sick days and paid leave that would allow them to balance work and family. I think we're – [applause] – I think we are embarrassed by, even shocked by, the fact we are just one of nine [10:00] countries in the entire world without national paid family leave. Now, you may not realize that, because here in California, this state has had paid leave for 10 years. And the last time I looked, it seemed to work well for both businesses and families.

But even that is not a silver bullet. As Sheryl Sandberg and others have reminded us, even the professional women who have access to these basic benefits are often set back in their careers, in some cases simply for taking advantage of family leave or flexible schedules, and others because of more subtle biases or attitudes in the workplace. When I was a young lawyer and was pregnant, I worked in a small law firm, and there was no family leave policy. It had never come up before. I was the first woman to be a partner in that law firm. And so nobody said anything to me and I didn't say anything to them; I just kept getting bigger and bigger and bigger. And I'd walk down the halls, and some of my partners would avert their eyes. They didn't know what to say to me. So when the time came and I went in and gave birth, the next morning, the lead partner called, and he said two things: he said "congratulations," and "when are you coming back to work?" I said, "Well, thank you very much. Maybe in four months." Pause. He goes, "Oh. Okay." He had no idea. I had no idea. But I was in a position where I could say, "Okay. Four months." And too many women even in those days – I can remember so well – they [12:00] lost their jobs, they were marginalized, they were demoted for doing one of the most important jobs anybody in a society has: producing the next generation.

And even though things have changed in many places, not nearly enough and not everywhere, in so many ways, our economy seems to be operating like its 1955. And that's not just a problem for working women. It's a problem for everyone. Just think about all he hard-working families that depend on two incomes to make ends meet. When one is short-changed, the entire family suffers. In fact, more than 40% of mothers are now the sole or primary breadwinners for our families and our economy depends on the strong participation by women – women moving into the workforce in large numbers helped drive a significant amount of America's economic growth over the past forty years. Without that movement, the average American family would be earning $14,000 less today, and our gross domestic product would be about $2 trillion smaller. So when women's participation is limited, our country's prosperity is limited too. And there are still too many women who want to work more and earn more but are held back by outdated policies and pressures. That hurts them. That hurts their families. That translates into more families struggling. We're just leaving that money, that growth on the table. And many families then can't afford their standard of living. They can't afford to get into [14:00] and stay in the middle class.

Sometimes when I would go out and talk about women's issues, which I've done for decades and particularly as Secretary of State, when I said that it was the great unfinished business of the 21st Century, because the data on all of this is overwhelming, I could see men's eyes glaze over. I could see particularly foreign leaders but some Americans too saying, "Oh yeah. Here she goes. Just look like you're concentrating. Act like you're listening and this too shall pass." But when we began using the economic data collected by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank and a lot of other organizations both public and private and I could say, "Do you know how much money you're leaving on the table? Do you know how much greater your economic growth and GDP could be if women were able to participate fully in the economy? Because this great unfinished business of the 21st Century really is moving toward the full participation of girls in every aspect of society all over the world. That is a goal that has inspired me from the time I was an advocate for children and families through today and which I took with me into the State Department, because I wanted it to be a priority of American foreign policy, because where women are included, you're more likely to have democracy, you're more likely to have stability and prosperity. So it's not just a nice thing to do. It's important to our economic growth and our security.

And since leaving the [16:00] government, I've worked on it at the Clinton Foundation with my daughter. And Chelsea and I are working with Melinda Gates and other partners on an initiative we call No Ceilings: The Full Participation Project. We're collecting the best data and research available on the gains women and girls have made around the world over the last twenty years. And we're looking at ways to accelerate progress in the years ahead. Next month, we'll publish a sweeping global progress report full of data designed to be accessible, sharable, even snackable, and I hope you all will check it out.

Now, there will be good news to celebrate. For example, around the world, we've nearly closed the gender gap in primary education. But there's also bad news, including the persistent gap between boys and girls in secondary education. When it comes to technology, the data reveals a massive digital divide – an estimated 200 million fewer women than men are online in developing countries, and you know better than most how Internet access can help unleash economic growth, lift people out of poverty, so this is a problem, but it is also an opportunity to build new markets, to improve education, to spur new growth. Technology has the potential to empower women and girls like nothing ever before, and it is helping inspire and mobilize grassroots action in places we'd never expect. I've seen that firsthand. I've seen how innovations starting right here are helping to lift people out of poverty, giving them more control over their own lives, helping them hold their governments accountable. I'll never forget one woman I met at a tech camp that we set up at the [18:00] State Department in Lithuania to train pro-democracy activists from Russia and other Soviet countries, help them stay one step ahead of the censors and secret police. It was part of a broader effort that included investing in new apps and devices to protect dissidents, like a panic button that a protestor could press on a phone that would signal to friends that she was being arrested, while simultaneously erasing all of her personal contacts. For the tech camps we brought along experts from Twitter, Facebook, Microsoft, to explain how activists could protect their privacy and anonymity on line and thwart restrictive government firewalls. I asked one young woman from Belarus if she was scared that coming to this Tech Camp would get her in trouble back home. She said no, 'My government can go to Hell' she said, 'I'm here to learn how I can promote democracy.'

My goal was to make the State Department a hub of innovation, leading the way with what we call 21st century state craft, harnessing new technologies, public private partnerships, diaspora networks, tapping expertise right here in Silicon Valley to help build the programs that would address the challenges from the drug war in northern Mexico, to the epidemic of rape in the Eastern Congo, to persecution in the Middle East. And a partnership we call Civil Society 2.0 helped deliver technology training to more than 1,000 civil society organizations from 80 countries, and I was very pleased that we were ranked in the State Department as having the most innovation-friendly culture. Now, the federal government has a long way to go so you might think that's [20:00] damning with faint praise, but we were pleased that the work we were doing was being recognized, that we could effectively partner with Silicon Valley and the broader tech community.

We had a great public-private partnership called mWomen, which brought together leading telecom companies from around the world to narrow the digital divide. And, there was this wonderful woman from India at the launch event, she represented the Self Employed Women's Association, SEWA, an economic cooperative that has transformed the lives of millions of poor women through microloans and other support. Here's the story she told me: she said for most of her life she had never seen a cell phone, she made a meager living by picking flowers and then bringing them to the local market, where she would go from trader to trader hoping to find a buyer. Sometimes her entire day was spent this way with nothing sold. Then she joined SEWA and through SEWA she got a loan for $48 to buy her first mobile phone. Suddenly she could actually call different markets, arrange to sell her flowers at a fair price in a fraction of the time. She used the money she saved to start a small business; she started buying and selling grain from neighboring villages also using her cell phone. It was her dream that every woman would get a phone.

Now the bottom line from all the data and all the stories is this, we still have a long way to go but progress is possible, especially when we make a commitment of resources and political will. In fact I think we are at a pivotal point that requires all of us to work together, roll up our sleeves, figure out what we're going to do, whether it's here in Silicon Valley or [22:00] halfway around the world, to help shape the future we want, to close the digital divide, to unlock our full potential, crack every last glass ceiling. So technology presents both peril and promise for all human beings, and it also presents some challenges for our economy and this is another area where we should be clear-eyed about the gains and about the gaps. American innovation, including the work many of you do, holds such enormous potential. Whether it's clean energy, or cloud computing, or the Internet of things new advances will continue to revolutionize how we live, learn, and do business. And increasingly, the divide between the old economy and the new is breaking down. The next wave of innovation could reach far beyond not just Silicon Valley but certainly beyond our nation's borders, creating new industries and remaking established ones, and that's important because even the most successful tech startups rarely end up hiring large numbers of American workers. So there's enormous promise in the intersection of new technology, IT, but also nanotech, biotech, robotics, and traditional industries like energy, automobiles, health care, education, and more. That's really the beating heart of the American economy. That's where most American's work. So we should set our sights on increasing productivity, spurring growth, and improving standards for all, not just a few at the top. And let's be honest, as we've learned the hard way, there can be a real human cost to some of these amazing innovations. We can't lose sight of that. Just as technology can boost productivity and create jobs, it has the potential to put many people out of their jobs by automating processes that used to require a full [24:00] day's work. Advances that are supposed to move us ahead can end up leaving a lot of people further behind. And I know from my own travels and discussions how many Americans feel the ground shifting under their feet. The old jobs and careers are either gone or unrecognizable, and the old rules just don't seem to apply, and, frankly, the new rules are just not that clear, and the result is anxiety and dislocation.

Just think about how much our families have changed, with caregivers becoming breadwinners. Well, our jobs have changed too, and wages no longer rise with productivity, while CEO pay keeps going up. Young people expect to change jobs much more frequently, certainly, than their parents. So if we want to find our balance again, we have figure out how to make this new economy work for everyone. That's why we have to ask how we organize ourselves so that technological change helps create more jobs, not just disrupts and displaces them, and how we try to have rising wages. We have to redouble our efforts to provide the education and skills, not just for our kids but for adults too so they have the tools they need to change jobs or start businesses. And we have to think hard about how to have the flexibility and support that American families need so that parents can be both great workers and great parents.

And that brings me back to Moore's Law and the march of progress, because we can't do this without working together. We can't do it without really empathizing and understanding what our neighbors are going through. But I think we can help more families find a way forward, find their footing in the middle class, find a [26:00] way to see rising wages and rising hopes. I think it's within our grasp, but I know it's not inevitable. Our economic success is not a birthright, it can't be inherited, it has to be earned by each generation, just like it was earned by those who came before us. My grandfather was a factory worker in the lace mills in Scranton, Pennsylvania. Proudly worked there from the age of 11 until he retired at 65. My father made it to college on a football scholarship, started a small business. My mother overcame a childhood of abandonment to help build a middle-class life for me and my brothers. And I knew I was the beneficiary not only of their love and hard work, but their aspirations for us and a larger community that believed as they did in America's promise. I never doubted how fortunate I was to live in America in a time of such positive change from the postwar economic boom to the civil rights movement to the women's movement, and I hope for all of our children the same sense of possibility that I had.

Now, it can be easy to get discouraged sometimes if you look only at the headlines, but if you look at the trend lines you can see there is a movement stirring across our nation. It is about putting families first. It is about creating a 21st century economy for 21st century families. You can see it in parents across California who demanded paid sick leave so they wouldn't have to choose between their jobs and their kids. You can see it in the security guards right here in Silicon Valley who are organizing for more hours, not fewer. You can see it in the hourly workers in San Francisco who fought to make shift [28:00] schedules more predictable and family life more stable. You can see it in the businesses and community leaders coming together to invest in early childhood education in Oakland. And you can see it in the moms demanding for equal pay for equal work and the dads demanding access to quality, affordable childcare.

So many people are just asking for that same chance. A chance at a living wage, at their dreams, and there are many reasons to think that we will reinvent ourselves, we will figure out how we're going to do this, we'll be part of the solution. That's really what I think Lead On means. Yes, lead on for yourselves. All of us have to come to grips with rising and falling, as I heard Renee Brown say at the very end. We fall together, we rise together. And as women, let's do more to help all women lead on and succeed. My friend Madeleine Albright famously said, "there is a special spot in Hell for women who don't help other women."

So – [applause] – what you do does not have to be big and dramatic. You don't have to run for office. [applause] Although, if you do, more power to you. But seriously, a helping hand or a kind word can make a big difference. It's one of those "click" moments where you [30:00] realize that helping somebody else not only feels good but ends up helping you. The more we stand with each other, the more obstacles we can overcome, the more we will be able to shape our own destinies. That's true not just for women, it's true for everyone. Indeed, it's true for our entire country.

So you came here today under the banner of Lead On, wanting to listen and learn and meet and talk and network, because there may be nuggets you can pick up and use for your own professional or personal betterment. But there may also be ways you can think about, "You know, I hadn't thought about how that could help my friend or my coworker, my neighbor. I'm going to try to have a conversation about what I heard today." Or about an issue that you really have been kind of stewing over, but now maybe go out and find some other people to lead on with you to try to resolve. To prove every single day that progress is possible in our own lives. And believe me, I know that's not easy. Because we have no time to waste.

You know, in our report – the progress report we're issuing with the Gates Foundation on the progress women around the world, including the United States, have made over the last 20 years – we boldly assert that there has never been a better time to be a woman in the history of the world. And indeed, I believe that with all my heart. The changes that I've seen in my own life – changes I've watched my daughter go [32:00] through and what I now think about the future for my granddaughter – I'm absolutely convinced of that. But I also believe – and maybe it's part of the American DNA – we have a special obligation to make it better for each other as well as ourselves, and to set an example for people across the globe.

You know, when my granddaughter Charlotte was born on September 26th, 2014, I have to confess, I was just overwhelmed. I've had lots of friends who got to grandparenthood before me and who have far more grandchildren than I will ever catch up to. And I heard them and I listened to them, and I thought, "That's really nice." And then all of a sudden, here is this new life, this new hope, this new opportunity; this blessing given to us in my family. And of course, her parents, her grandparents, her extended family – we will do whatever it takes to make sure that this baby has every opportunity in the world. But even as I say that, I know that's not enough. Because she will become a citizen of our country and of the world in 20, 25 years God willing, and what kind of world is going to be there waiting for her? Is it a world of hope or fear? Is it a world of possibility or shrunken, destroyed dreams? I don't know. I do know that it really matters for the life I hope she will lead that we do [34:00] everything we can now to make sure every child is given the same opportunities we will do our best to provide for her. I believe talent is universal, but opportunity is not. And leading on means, in large measure, how we expand that circle of opportunity, so every girl and boy has a chance to be all she or he can become, with their own efforts, their own work, but with the support and the love of the rest of us. The time to start is now. I'm excited about what we can do together, and I believe that all of us can certainly show the way as we lead on to the kind of future we want. Thank you all very, very much.

ANNOUNCER: [Welcomes Kara Swisher to stage]

KARA SWISHER: I didn't know I was an entrepreneur.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SEC. CLINTON: By definition, right?

SWISHER: Exactly. [Makes administrative announcement] So hello.

SEC. CLINTON: Hello.

SWISHER: How are you doing? So I interviewed President Obama last week and I'm very eager to interview another president.

SEC. CLINTON: [laughter] [36:00] That's good [high five].

SWISHER: So I wanted to ask the big question, iphone or android?

SEC. CLINTON: iphone. Okay, in full disclosure, and a blackberry, and I think the president told you the same thing.

SWISHER: Except I think he really loves his.

SEC. CLINTON: Well you know, it is, there are reasons why when you start out in Washington on a Blackberry you stay on it in many instances, but it's also, I don't know, I don't throw anything away. I'm like two steps short of a hoarder, so I have a, you know, an ipad, a mini ipad, an iphone, and a Blackberry.

SWISHER: [comments about use of Blackberry in DC, ask Sec. Clinton Apple watch or Fitbit]

SEC. CLINTON: Well, you can tell I'm not doing Fitbit, and I haven't gotten into the Apple watch yet. I'm not in a wearable frame of mind yet. You know, three people have given me a Fitbit or a Jawbone and I look at it and I think do I really want something telling me I should do what I know I should do. I mean, I have enough stress in my life avoiding doing what I'm told I should do, so I haven't jumped off the ledge yet.

SWISHER: [Running for President or hosting Oscars]

SEC. CLINTON: [38:00] Yeah well, and both jobs are really painful from my own personal experience and observation. I don't think I could do the Birdman imitation. That goes back to the Fitbit conversation, I couldn't do that.

SWISHER: But what about the president thing?

SEC. CLINTON: You know, there have been, there have been a lot more Oscar presentations than there have been presidents. So the pressure is probably somewhat less, it's a one night gig, and for many its just one night, and the other one it's, you know, a many year commitment.

SWISHER: Eight in your case, you hope. Correct?

SEC. CLINTON: Well, yeah, you've got to hope that. And I am, look if you don't tell anybody, I am obviously talking to a lot of people, thinking through, because here's my view on this Kara, I just think that we have so many big issues we have to deal with that unless we really can come together and have a national conversation about those issues we're not going to make the progress we make. And there are a lot of things that I would love to see our country do, I'd like to bring people from right, left, red, blue, get them into a nice warm purple space where everybody is talking and where we're actually trying to solve problems, and you know that would be my objective if I decide to do this.

SWISHER: Why wait announcing?

SEC. CLINTON: Well, all in good time is sort of my response because, [40:00] you know, there's a lot to think about I have to tell you. I don't know how many of you are list makers, I have a very long list, I'm going down it, I'm very, you know, I'm very committed to go down it but I haven't checked off the last couple of things here.

SWISHER: If you were to run, what would be the central parts of the campaign for you, you're talking about there's a lot of things, the purple thing I get that, but what would be the central thing that you'd want [inaudible]?

SEC. CLINTON: Well let me answer it this way by saying whoever runs here's what I think the central thing is, because we have to restore economic growth with rising wages for the vast majority of Americans and we have to restore trust and cooperation within our political system so that we can act like the great country we are, and those two things it seems to me are actually related. Because, you know there are some steps that business has to take, you know we heard Rene talking about what Intel's going to do, I talked about Google, we have to have businesses take a hard look, like how can they expand opportunity, be more inclusive, that's part of it. But we also have to figure out how we can have a foundation in our economy again that makes people feel that their hard work and effort will be rewarded because productivity is actually up. People are working longer hours than many had to work in the past but there's just no increase in their wages that demonstrates they're respected, appreciated –

SWISHER: What could a supposed president do to fix that?

SEC. CLINTON: Well, I think that, you know –

SWISHER: Actually, I'm going to call you the alleged president.

SEC. CLINTON: [Laughs] Well, I mean, this is where I'm supposed to say "stay tuned," you know. What I would say is, this is why we need to figure out how to go after this problem. And some of it is a bottom-up issue like the minimum wage. Some of it is a fairness and equity issue like equal pay for equal work, like paid leave so people can actually stay in the workforce. Women are, not because they want to but because they have to, dropping out of the workforce in many instances, thereby diminishing their income. So there are certain steps that a government can and should take and in the past we've seen a government sort of shore that up. And then there are ways that we have to recast our thinking. You know, so much about the rise in productivity without the rise in wages has to do with decisions that businesses are making. And a lot of businesses say to me, "Look, we are under tremendous pressure, quarterly pressure. We have to meet certain targets. And we just don't have the leeway." And my response is, well we need to create that leeway. How do we look at what's happening in corporate governance, in how the incentives work within the corporate world today, and figure out if there's some way we can help the good guys so that they can actually do more for their employees. And I'm looking at a lot of different approaches.

SWISHER: Can you actually create jobs? Because a lot – you referenced it – and many Silicon Valley people reference it, is that they're going to be fewer jobs.

SEC. CLINTON: Right.

SWISHER: And as things become automated –

SEC. CLINTON: Well let me give you two quick examples. One, look at the enormous numbers of jobs that technology created, starting in the nineties, right? I mean, it was a huge explosion, not just in tech companies but across the board. And now we've got to figure out, are we hitting a ceiling because with increased innovation, automation, we're not able to create more jobs, or is there more that we can do in order to promote job creation? But it's not just job creation, it has to be with a rising wage, an opportunity ladder. Energy is a huge opportunity. Energy efficiency jobs are woefully underrepresented in the economy. Now there are things that both utility companies and governments at local, state, the federal level, could do to encourage more jobs that would move us toward more renewable energy. We've done a bit of it, but we haven't done near-enough of it. And so there is an area where it's sitting right there and we're not doing everything we could. We don't have a level playing field, we still highly subsidize non-renewable, non-clean energy. We should have a much more open, competitive field so that energy efficiency, solar, geothermal, wind, all of that, is on a stronger foundation – and we will create more jobs.

SWISHER: Alright, let's talk about the – [applause] – why do you think we need a woman president? Just curious.

SEC. CLINTON: [Laughs] Well –

SWISHER: Besides "she'd be better."

SEC. CLINTON: Well, speaking hypothetically?

SWISHER: Yeah.

SEC. CLINTON: Well, you know –

SWISHER: We can say "President Warren," if you want. But it's more of a –

SEC. CLINTON: Well, yeah, you know I think whoever it is – or should be – we need to make sure that all the talent in our country is represented. I mean –

SWISHER: But do you think it's be a different president, being a woman?

SEC. CLINTON: Well, I can only speak both for myself and for my experience. But having been in the Senate and having seen the difference that women in the Senate made, the most famous example – and it's literally hard to believe right now – but in the seventies and eighties women were not used as subjects in clinical trials by the National Institutes of Health. And in fact, big trials on breast cancer did not include women patients. [Laughter] I know, it's so sad right? And so along came –

SWISHER: Also weird.

SEC. CLINTON: – somebody like Barbara Mikulski and others who were determined to "lead on," and they changed that. Now that's a specific example and there are many others where the experience of being a woman, the ability to see what others might not see, as either gender discrimination or marginalization, gives us a chance to speak up, to be heard, and to make changes. You know, when I was first lady I worked with a lot of the breast cancer advocates to continue on breast cancer because it was one of the most egregious examples, and we kept seeing how research for the causes, prevention of breast cancer kept being cut. And so I worked with a lot of these advocates and we put a breast cancer research program into the defense department budget – because it wouldn't be cut. [Applause] Now, we had to keep saving it, because people found it and tried to cut it. But that's the kind of difference, that you sit and talk – and this is bipartisan, you know, women on both sides of the aisle. They have these views, and we had some of the best times, we had dinners every month together. They were totally off the record, they were not political. We would say, "Well, what are you working on? How can we help?" And so it was what you would hope your elected officials would do together and I think there's a lot more of that and, you know, women in public life do bring that perspective which we need.

SWISHER: Well, why do you think – let's get to Silicon Valley. You talked about Rosanna [Patricia] Arquette's statement at the Oscars, the wage inequalities. Those numbers you coded for Google, it's every single company in Silicon Valley. It's essentially white dudes and a couple of ladies.

SEC. CLINTON: Right. Right.

SWISHER: How do you – what do you think about that? This is supposed to be our most fast-forward industry, the one where all the jobs are. But it's completely –

SEC. CLINTON: Well, you know I've thought a lot about it, and I thin, overgeneralize, three big reasons. One, this pipeline problem. You know, when you had more women getting computer science degrees in the '80s by a factor of 2+ than you do now, that kind of let's people off the hook. You know, why aren't more girls and women going into this field? What was different about being a high-school or college student in the '80s than it is today? And I think we need to unpack that, and we have to do more to create opportunities for girls to have access to computer science, programing, coding experiences to kind of light those interests in them. And then secondly, I do think you have to recognize that in technology, which has just exploded over the last twenty years, it's been a very almost Wild West environment, and I think a lot of women find that distasteful, unappealing to be in a situation sort of resembling a locker room in some ways where you just feel like you're… it's hard to get your voice in. It's hard to be heard. It's like that classic tale when you say something in a meeting and nobody pays attention and then twenty minutes later a man says it and everybody thinks he's a genius. And I've had that experience a lot of times. And you just have to… you have to kind of gird up and you therefore need support systems like the Watermark or like this conference, because it's not easy if you poke your head above the parapet if you're in technology, politics, and a lot of other areas.

And the third thing is I think companies should be held to account. I mean, you need shareholders and executives and customers and others to say "Hey, you can do better than 83% male."

SWISHER: [How do you change the systemic qualities that create that locker-room culture?]

SEC. CLINTON: Look, I think that it requires both men and women to speak up and speak out about this and I think for men it's always fascinating when you talk to groups of men in tech or any other industry, it's almost inevitable in my experience that they… some of them will tell me how great their daughters are and how well their daughters are doing and what their daughters hope to become. And I always say, "Don't you want your daughter to be able to go as far as she can go in whatever field she chooses? "Oh of course." Well, you're a bank, you're a big corporation, you're this, you're that. You better pay attention to the kind of environments that educated young women are going into and maybe raise questions about it, so men have to be more sensitive to, more interested in, creating this environment, and if you can't get them on the daughter side of argument, try to get them on the fact that we are now amassing evidence that corporations with women on boards actually do better. They have a higher ROI. They are consistently you know more successful.

And so, we have some both personal and some statistical data to back it up. But then I think for women that's why I ended by talking about how we have to support each other more. And this is a constant challenge, and we need to be willing to stand up for other women, to raise questions about how other women are being treated. I remember all those years ago when I was in this law firm [4:00], around 3 o'clock, every secretary, every administrative assistant, every woman paralegal would be on the phone trying to make sure their kid got home safely. Because the kids were coming home, they were what we called then "latch-key" kids, and they wanted to make sure their kids were safe. And they were whispering in the phone, because you're not supposed to make personal phone calls at business. And I finally went to the partners and said, "This is absurd. You should have a window of opportunity. These women work so hard. They're great members of our team." So you need to pick up on what's happening and not just among your peers but women who may not have the power and position you do. And then finally, develop a thick skin. I mean, my favorite predecessor, Eleanor Roosevelt, said that women in the public arena have to grow skin as thick as the hide of a rhinoceros, and you have to be prepared… you know, try to think ahead of the smart thing you'll say if somebody makes an offensive comment to you, instead of what we all do which is, you sit there shocked and then in bed at night you think, "Oh, I wish I'd said this." Sort of have a stock of those that you kind of carry around with you. And throw out and you know kind of say, "Oh, take that."

SWISHER: You know, you're pretty good at that actually.

SEC. CLINTON: You know, I've had a lot of practice. I mean I started… I mean really.

SWISHER: But would you put this idea of childcare at the center of an administration, a real center and not a sort of side way?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SEC. CLINTON: Now look, I think…

SWISHER: Did you do enough in the last campaign to bring it to the center?

SEC. CLINTON: You know…

SWISHER: Many say you didn't.

SEC. CLINTON: Well, you know, I've heard that. And I'm certainly trying to learn from what I did right and what I didn't in thinking through, you know, doing this again. I think that the family issues, sort of putting families first, creating more supportive work environments so that if you do that, what people find is that women who get treated well are such loyal employees. They will stay with the company. They will work double-time. They will do everything they can to make the enterprise that supported them successful. So this is not a nice thing to do, this [54:00] is a win-win. I think that child care, these family issues, are now bubbling to the top of the list on people's minds.

SWISHER: So let's talk a little bit about some of the issues around the tech sector. We talked backstage, net neutrality. They're going to vote on it Thursday. The president's been rather aggressive about making it a utility. Do you think it should be a utility?

SEC. CLINTON: Well here's what I think. I think that it, for the FCC to do what they want to do to try to –

SWISHER: -- regulate it like a phone.

SEC. CLINTON: -- create net neutrality as the norm, they have to have a hook to hang it on and so they're hanging it on title 2 of –

SWISHER: Do you like that hook?

SEC. CLINTON: Well it's the only hook they've got.

SWISHER: Yeah but what hook would you like? [crosstalk] Because your husband's administration and the Bush administration before were much hands off in that regard.

SEC. CLINTON: Well you see how things develop. It wasn't really a threat until relatively recently. I think I gave my first statement on net neutrality about eight or nine years ago. And we know how important it is because of concentration and the industry and the like. But I think that if there were another hook it would come out of a modern, 21st century telecom technology act. We don't have that and we're not likely to get it

SWISHER: Should this vote open that way?

SEC. CLINTON: Oh yeah absolutely.

SWISHER: Would you vote for that?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SEC. CLINTON: Yes I would. Yes I would.

SWISHER: That act, but what about the one the FCC's invented?

SEC. CLINTON: I would vote for net neutrality because as I understand it, it's Title II with a lot of changes within it in order to avoid the worst of the utility regulation. So it's a foot in the door. It's a value statement. I think the president is right to be up front and out front on that but it's not the end of the discussion. I mean we need to do more about how the spectrum is allocated, we need to do more incentivize more competition in broadband. We need to figure out how to treat connectivity as an infrastructure development. There's a lot of other aspects so it's not just net neutrality standing alone, end of debate – and that should be part of a really smart legislative endeavor – but I don't think people believe that can happen in the short term.

SWISHER: Okay. What about encryption? Right now Apple and Google are fighting the government. Do you have a side in this? Which, the president was kind of, "I was for it until I was against it" kinda thing. Where do you feel on encryption? Do you feel these companies should be able to encrypt these phones?

SEC. CLINTON: Well I think you have a classic hard choice and I wrote a book called Hard Choices and it's not a dodge, or a feint, because I think that what we're missing is people are kind of in their corners arguing about liberty versus security instead of saying look we all want to have privacy for the end user. That's what the companies are responding to, they're trying to be able to tell their customers we're going to protect your data but we also don't want to find ourselves in a position where it's a legitimate security threat we're facing and we can't figure out how to address it because we have no way into whatever is holding the information. And we're also not operating in a vacuum. We know that other countries are taking their own steps to monitor the internet, control the internet, which we're not but what we've got to figure out is how you get the right balance. So encryption is a part of protecting people's legitimate right to privacy.

SWISHER: How would you address Google and Apple if you were the president?

SEC. CLINTON: Well I've talked to some of the leaders in technology, some of the executives of these companies, and I think that's the way to start, not a – a real conversation, where you say look here's our problem. If you were sitting in my seat, if all of a sudden some president said okay Mr. or Miss X we want you to be head of the counterterrorism or the new cyber warfare, something that takes advantage of your expertise. So you're sitting in these meetings that the president and I and others have sat in and we can see the sequencing where we know people are in contact and we have both human intelligence and some technology-enabled intelligence and we know there's something going to happen and we're trying to figure out how to get through the door that has been locked. So I think the conversation rather than you don't understand privacy and you don't understand security [inaudible] Okay let's figure out how we're going to do this. So I don't have the answer, I would be the first to say that I don't have the answer. I think there are really strong legitimate arguments on both sides and what I would like to see is more the kind of brainstorming that I've had the good fortune to do.

SWISHER: Another issue of contention is the NSA. Would you throttle back the NSA in the ways that President Obama had promised and hasn't come to pass?

SEC. CLINTON: Well I think the – look – I think the NSA needs to be more transparent about what it is doing, sharing with the American people. Which it wasn't. And I think a lot of the reaction about the NSA when people felt betrayed. They felt like, wait you didn't tell us you were doing this and all of a sudden now we're reading it on the front page, we're getting hammered by our customers and by other countries – I would say very hypocritically – are going after our companies because I know for a fact that there's not a country out there that doesn't do anything they can do to get an advantage. And they do things that we would never do, like industrial espionage, like stealing intellectual property. So there's a lot that's going on in this space. So when you say would you throttle – the NSA has to act lawfully and we as a country have to decide what the rules are. And then [1:00:00] we have to make it absolutely clear we're going to hold them accountable. And what we had, because of post-9/11 legislation, was a lot more flexibility than I think people really understood and was not explained to them. I voted against the FISA amendments in 2008 because I didn't think that they went far enough to kind of hold us accountable in the Congress to figure out what was –

SWISHER: -- By flexibility you mean too much spying power really?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SEC. CLINTON: Well yeah but how much is too much? And how much is not enough? That's the hard part. I think if Americans felt like, number one, you're not going after my personal information, the content of my personal information, but I do want you to get the bad guys because I don't want them to use social media, use, you know, communications devices embedded right here to plot against us. So let's draw the line. And I think it's hard if everybody's in their corner. So, I resist saying, you know, it has to be this or that. I want us to come to a better balance.

SWISHER: Do you think Edward Snowden was a traitor in revealing that?

SEC. CLINTON: I can never condone what he did, and I think he, you know, he stole millions of documents, and the great irony is the vast majority of those documents had nothing to do with American civil liberties, privacy, or anything affecting us here at home. They were about information we had vis a vis China, Russia, Iran, others. And then he fled to China, then he ends up in Russia. So, you know, the President had given a speech before Snowden's disclosures laying out some of those issues that we needed to address. So people were beginning to take a deep breath after a decade of 9/11 reaction, and the President was sort of leading that. And along comes Snowden, and puts forth information into the public domain that people are entitled to know, but I think it's fair to say a lot of it was nothing to do with the subject we're talking about, but very damaging to our national security vis a vis countries that do their very best to gather information about us.

SWISHER: Alright, two more things. Couple more topics. ISIS. Disturbing videos, they're using social media, creating terror there. Has the Administration done enough to tackle the problem, and what would you do more to deal with them?

SEC. CLINTON: Well, you know, again, how much time do we have? I think not enough –

SWISHER: As much as you want. [laughter] We can sit here all day.

SEC. CLINTON: – yeah, you know, look. OK, then let me start with this. ISIS is the manifestation of a movement that is incredibly fueled by an obsession to control territory, to reestablish, as they say, a caliphate that would be governed by people with a very retrograde view of everything about women, everything I care about, everything about due process or rights or anything. We know that. So why are they – why did they get a foothold? Well, first of all, they are the successor to what was called al Qaeda in Iraq. Al Qaeda in Iraq was an al Qaeda affiliate that was based in the Sunni regions within Iraq and was fighting the Shiite forces in Iraq during the American involvement in Iraq. They were so brutal at that time that it provided the opportunity for a lot of the Sunni tribal sheiks and community leaders to band against them, to come together to try to drive them out of Anbar Province and out of the Sunni dominated regions, and they were successful in doing so because they finally decided that the enemy of my enemy is my friend didn't work, because these people were so brutal, so beyond the pale. So they effectively squashed them, and then the United States turned over Iraq to the elected leadership of then Prime Minister Maliki. And he proceeded to then alienate all the Sunni leaders and citizenry, purged the army of Sunni officers, generally behaved in a sectarian, exclusive, oppressive way, and so these shoots that had been suppressed began to pop to the surface. Meanwhile, next door in Syria you have all kinds of extremist groups taking advantage of the vacuum there, and one of them morphed into ISIS and was able to recruit former officers in the Saddam Hussein army, as well as foreign fighters, as well as very combat-experienced jihadists, and were able to gather up a lot of resources by breaking into banks and stealing everything in them, by stealing oil and selling it on the black market etcetera. And they did something that, up until now, no other extremist group has done as effectively and that use social media. So, all of the sudden it wasn't just like, oh my gosh those people are killing each other over there again, it was oh my gosh they're threatening us, they're recruiting kids from the United States, Canada, Europe, elsewhere, they are threatening to expand their territorial grasp, they are really a metastasizing danger. So, therefore, we have to work with our partners in the region to try to diminish and eventually eradicate the threat, because it does affect us and not just them.

SWISHER: But how, do you think enough is being done?

SEC. CLINTON: Well, I think that it's, you know, it's a very hard challenge because you can't very well put American or western troops in to fight this organism, you have to use, not only air force, but also army soldiers from the region, and particularly from Iraq. And so what Americans are doing now is helping to retrain the Iraqi army after it was really decimated by Maliki trying to get leadership back in within the Sunni regions, trying to integrate them so the Sunnis feel they have a stake in the future, supporting the Kurds because the Kurdish peshmerga are right now certainly the best fighting force. It's like three, four, five dimensional chess. So yes, I think a lot of the right moves are being made, but this is a really complicated and long term problem, because remember, we've got al Qaeda in Yemen, we've got Boko Haram in North Africa. We've got terrorist groups from, you know, the Sinai through Libya and south into Mali. This is a long term struggle, so –

SWISHER: So are you sure you want to be president then? [laughter]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SEC. CLINTON: Yeah, yeah. Well, you know, every time has its own problems, so these happen to be some of ours.

SWISHER: That's true. So, two more very quick questions. If you could wave a wand and change anything about this country, what would it be? One thing.

SEC. CLINTON: Oh, oh, that's so hard.

SWISHER: And not another season of Downton Abbey or something like that.

SEC. CLINTON: Well, I hope that happens without me waving a magic wand. You know, that we could get back to working together cooperatively again, that we could get out of our – [applause] – our mindsets, our partisan bunkers. We've come so far. We still have lots to do on ending, you know, sexism and racism and homophobia and all kinds of really bad issues that we've had to confront. And we have work still to do, but we're making a lot of progress, but nobody wants to associate with anybody who doesn't agree with them politically. You can't have a conversation. People won't listen to each other. They listen to different media, and those different media tell different stories about the very same thing that you're watching unfold in front of your eyes. You cannot run a great country like that, and this is the greatest country, and we need to start acting like it and working like it again.

SWISHER: Do you think you've become less polarizing?

SEC. CLINTON: I mean, yeah, obviously I think I have. I think that, you know, I was a little bit surprised. I mean, when I was first lady of Arkansas, I worked on a lot of really controversial issues in education and health. And I worked with people across the aisle, worked with people of different philosophies because within the Democratic Party in those days, there were lots of very conservative Democrats. And then I go to Washington, and all of a sudden it's considered just an incredible shock that somebody like me, who's been an advocate, been involved in so many movements for so long, would actually have an opinion about something like healthcare for everybody, or whatever it might be. So I think there was some back and forth there that I had to understand better and I certainly tried to do that when I ran for the Senate that was something that I stressed. And when I worked in the senate I was very much somebody who would work across the aisle, look for opportunities to do that. Because I don't think I have all the right ideas, I don't think my part has all the right ideas, I think there are good ideas in lots of places, but if you don't talk to each other, you don't listen to each other, and in Washington you don't spend time with each other because you fly in you vote, vote, vote, and then you fly out to go raise money. I'll just end with this because I know we're running out of time. I was so proud of my friend Patty Murray, the Senator from Washington, who when the government was shut down a year or so ago, she was the chair of the budget committee, and so they shut the government down, and then they reopen it, but they basically say we have to pass a budget. They turn to Patty and say you okay, you're the chair of the Budget Committee, go work out a budget. So Patty, worked with Paul Ryan, the former Vice Presidential nominee for Mitt Romney, congressman from Wisconsin, and they actually talked to each other. They didn't show up at a big conference table with valences of true believes on each side of them with notebooks filled with argumentation. They had breakfast together, they lunch together, they'd sit and talk about what each of them wanted, knowing they couldn't agree on giving each other everything, but how could they make enough decisions to reach a consensus, and they did. So it's possible, and it requires relationship building. You know, a lot of people that I have really serious disagreements with I found ways to work together and I got to know better, and that's kind of lost. So this is, as you can tell, one of my pet peeves here.

SWISHER: So my last question, I asked this the President last question. If you could have a hashtag for the next few years, and you can't do grandmother knows best, you've used that one, but you could do Hillary 2016 if you want, just offering a suggestion. Hash tag I love selfies, whatever, what would it be? Your hashtag?

SEC. CLINTON: Lead on.

SWISHER: Thank you.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you all very much!

McCain Pastor: Islam Is a 'Conspiracy of Spiritual Evil' (ABC 5/22/08)
By BRIAN ROSS, AVNI PATEL and REHAB EL-BURI
Despite his call for the U.S. to win the "hearts and minds of the Islamic world," Sen. John McCain recruited the support of an evangelical minister who describes Islam as "anti-Christ" and Mohammed as "the mouthpiece of a conspiracy of spiritual evil." McCain sought the support of Pastor Rod Parsley of the World Harvest Church of Columbus, Ohio at a critical time in his campaign in February, when former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee was continuing to draw substantial support from the Christian right.

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

More Anti-Lobbyist Than Thou (Washington Post 5/23/08)

SHAKESPEARE'S famous line about lawyers could easily be adapted for this year's campaign: "The first thing we do, let's purge all the lobbyists." The presidential contest in recent days has degenerated into a competition between Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) over which one reviles lobbyists more and relies on them less. The McCain campaign has been tossing overboard a lobbyist a day to comply with an anti-lobbyist policy written by, yes, its lobbyist-turned-campaign manager. The Obama campaign seized on the issue to portray the McCain campaign as bought and paid for by lobbyists, then found itself under fire for having a looser policy than the McCain campaign when it comes to lobbyists who volunteer for campaign work.

It may surprise you to learn that the current G.I. Bill has depreciated so much that it doesn't even cover half the cost of an in-state public university. When I joined the Marines in 2002, I didn't rely on the educational benefits as advertised because I knew Congress has yet to fulfill the original promise of the G.I. Bill in modern-day terms - to provide full educational benefits to every service member. But many veterans did take that promise to heart, and today they have the debt to show for it.

Subject:	Turkey and ISIS (Defense Policy Board)

Dear Jake,

I know the last thing in the world you are focusing on is Turkey and ISIS, with the debate tonight (where I hope she will hit on his non-electability and that his nomination will guarantee a Republican victory, since socialism is not acceptable to the broad electorate), and the upcoming Iowa caucus. But hopefully, this may be useful in the future.
This is a summary (without any classified information) from our Defense Policy Board meeting this week, the last part of which was with Secretary of Defense Ash Carter. He had asked us to look at Turkey and its role in dealing with ISIS. In our two days of meetings, we were briefed by a number of intelligence services, by four former U.S. Ambassadors to Turkey, and by three academic experts.

Here is a brief summary. I will be pleased to fill-in more details when you come up for breath, but I wanted to get this to you before I leave this afternoon for the World Economic Forum in Davos.

1. Turkey is a very difficult ally. Prime Minister Erdogan has taken Turkey in a more Islamic direction, and has cracked down hard on independent journalists, opposition politicians, and anyone he views as challenging him, including the military (15% of their flag officers are under arrest.. After an initial election setback, he feels embolden by his most recent electoral success, where he played the national security and populist card and won over many conservatives outside his ruling party. Since the election, he has ended promising peace talks with the PKK, and has gone after not only them, but Kurds more generally. Some of the experts and former Ambassadors felt Erdogan was driving the country to the brink of civil conflict.

2. Erdogan's prime goal is to have a referendum that will change the Constitution and create an Executive President, a strong presidential system. But he knows that even with his electoral success, it is not a given he would win. He also knows that with the economy slowing down, he must produce on this end to strengthen his chances in a referendum. But whether he wins or not, the U.S. must face the fact that he will be the prime interlocutor for many years to come.

3. His Cabinet is weak and he is the sole decision-maker on anything consequential.

4. His top priority and ours are different. Ours is fighting ISIS in Syria and Iraq. His is combating the PKK and the threat of a Kurdish independent state either in Turkey or in northern Syria and Iraq. He does not believe the U.S. has been sufficiently attentive to Turkey's security concerns including the PKK, even though we have them on our terrorist list. He sees the US support of the YPG (Syrian Kurdish party) in Syria, which is the most effective fighting force on our side against ISIS, as a threat to Turkey. He has decent relations with other Kurdish leaders, like Barzani and the Iraqi Kurds that he does not see as a threat.

5. His foreign policy has been based on having no enemies and calm on his borders. But he is now faced with chaos and conflict on his borders. He fears, with good reason an Iranian/Russian/Syrian/Kurdish axis. This, together with Turkey's slowing economic growth and large debt overhang, and his membership in NATO, gives us leverage. Indeed, one of the reasons he is warming-up to possible resumption of relations with Israel is his fear that he is isolated. He openly said he wants to restore relations with Israel. Likewise, he is taking a more conciliatory approach toward Cyprus, reciprocated by the new government there. This concern opens opportunities for the U.S. to get Erdogan to lean more to the West. Likewise, the burden of dealing with well over a million Syrian refugees, and the EU funds that will be provided to help keep them from coming to Europe, provides some leverage for the West.

6. He has acted provocatively in recent weeks. The downing of the Russian plane (which had been over Turkish airspace for only 17 seconds), and sending tanks briefly into Syria, are examples. Because Turkey is a NATO member, these types of actions have the risk of drawing in the U.S.

7. Around 50% of the Kurds in Turkey do not live in the Kurdish northern area, but are fully integrated into Turkish society, speak Turkish as their first language. But as Erdogan strikes at the Kurds in the north, they feel threatened.

8. The issue of doing more to get Turkey to close its border with Syria is tricky, since not only pro-ISIS foreign fighters come through, but also anti-Assad and anti-ISIS fighters.

9. Erdogan believes the U.S. needs Turkey more than Turkey needs the U.S. There was a division in the Board of how to deal with this problem. A few felt we should adopt a tougher tone to disabuse him of this belief, but a majority felt we should be exploring ways to take advantage of Turkey's economic problems and security threats to draw him closer to the U.S.

10. Several of the academic experts felt the turning point of Erdogan shifting from a pro-western to a more authoritarian, Islamic direction, was the ending of EU accession talks. We all realized this was a difficult time for Europe to resume talks, but there are some discussions on a few chapters and this could be elevated. But Kissinger felt it was a "fantasy" to think Erdogan could become pro-Western, since he is very pro-Islamic, but that there are still areas to cooperate based on shared security concerns.

11. While we should encourage Erdogan to resume talks with the PKK, this can only be done by the U.S. taking a more hard-line position on their violence.

12. Even with the sharp turn toward Islam, Turkey remains more democratic and pro-western than other Muslim states in the region. The business community and parts of the military, and the secular population (around 45% are pro-western).

13. We should be seeking a "transactional" relationship with Turkey, since a strategic partnership would be difficult. There are a number of specific steps we could take along this line. However, there was support for my idea of commencing a strategic dialogue (like we have with China), if only to better understand their concerns, and where our interests overlap. We also should do more to activate the Turkey-NATO relationship. Again, because he feels more vulnerable than ever before, given the situation in the region, we have some leverage.

14. Turkey wants a No-Fly Zone in northern Syria to protect refugees and staunch the flow into Turkey .But this can only happen if they and others put boots on the ground.

15. One unifying theme could be Iran, if we take a harder line to their misconduct. Moreover, we do have common security concerns, e.g. Iran and Russia and Assad.

16. Turkey is upset by not being in the TTIP negotiations, fearing they will lose markets in Europe and the U.S. We cannot add them, but should make clear that after an agreement, they can accede. We can also stress the importance of Turkey as an energy hub in the region. We can do more to help (e.g. through the IMF) with their economy.

I hope this is helpful, at some point down the road.

Good luck tonight and in the upcoming weeks.

Best wishes,

Subject: No Introduction

May 9, 2014

Dear Friends:

"Let me now introduce someone who needs no introduction."

It is a weird custom of the Washington windbag to follow sentences like this with a lengthy introduction of the next speaker.

Normally, this is pointless, since that person is most often well-known to everyone within the sound of the speaker's voice, but the introduction is made nonetheless.

In that spirit, we'd like to begin the News Blast this week with some introductions of our own.

Let's start with Assistant Secretaries of State Roberta Jacobson and Tom Malinowski who, as McClatchy reported , testified this week against imposing punitive economic sanctions on Venezuela.

Jacobson, who spoke for State's Western Hemisphere Affairs Bureau, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that hitting Venezuela's government with sanctions as a tactic to cool its political crisis "would serve to reinforce a narrative of the Venezuelan government standing up to the United States -- rather than the Venezuelan people standing up for themselves."

Malinowski, speaking for State's Human Rights Bureau, added on sanctions: "They work in some places, they don't work everywhere. Timing is extremely important."

These top State Department policymakers who oppose sanctions on Venezuela should discuss their "counterproductive" effects with the people who maintain our fifty-plus year old embargo on the government and people of Cuba.

While we're at it, let's also introduce the State Department policymakers who track Cuba on the fight against illegal drugs and terrorism.

In March, when the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs released a report giving high marks to Cuba's counter-narcotics efforts, it said "Cuba demonstrates increasing willingness to apprehend and turn over U.S. fugitives and to assist in U.S. judicial proceedings by providing documentation, witnesses and background for cases in U.S. state and federal Courts."

Yet, barely one month later, when the Bureau of Counterterrorism released the 2013 Report on the State Sponsors of Terror, it said "The Cuban government continued to harbor fugitives wanted in the United States" to justify keeping Cuba on the list.

Different fugitives, we know. But, shouldn't these guys talk?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Our last introduction is for Secretary of State, John Kerry, who gave a speech about the importance of entrepreneurship at a gathering of the Council of the Americas this week. At the end, he zeroed in on Cuba.

Secretary Kerry is worried that the Cuban people will "continue to be left behind (economically) as the rest of the hemisphere advances," unless more can be done to strengthen "the emerging micro-entrepreneurial sector in Cuba."

There is no shortage of ideas for stimulating more economic activity in Cuba. One came from Gary Becker, the Nobel Prize-winning economist, a staunch conservative and an anti-communist. In March, Becker, who died this week, wrote : "It is time to end the embargo on the export and import of goods and services between the United States and Cuba. The Cuban people will benefit almost immediately."

Also this week, the Boston Globe , Secretary Kerry's hometown newspaper, made the political case for economic engagement with Cuba:

> "There's a reason why the United States doesn't normally cut all ties to countries with repressive regimes. Economic engagement can be as powerful, or more powerful, a force for change than isolation. It doesn't erase tensions with offending regimes, but rather puts more pressure on them. It expresses to the people living under the regime a desire for cooperation; opportunities to better understand each other; and a closer look at American-style freedoms and democracy."

Despite these powerful arguments -- that ending economic sanctions would provide Cubans with greater economic opportunity and the chance for greater freedoms, just as Secretary Kerry said he wanted in his speech -- there's a catch. To accomplish these goals, we'd have to introduce him to the same person who kept Cuba on the State Sponsors of Terror List and who will not advocate publicly for increased travel and trade opportunities for Americans and Cubans.

By now, we're sure you're on to us. There is a reason the Venezuela sanctions people don't need an introduction to the Cuba Sanctions people, or the officials tracking drug fugitives to the policy makers who keep the terror list, or the supporters of microenterprise to the supporters of economic sanctions.

They're all the same guys. A lot of them smart and really good people.

It is the problem that needs no introduction, familiar to all within the sound of our voice.

Until our leaders confront the hardliners in Congress and the political culture that keeps these irrational, inconsistent, and ineffective policies in place, they'll just go on behaving like people who've never met.

This week in Cuba news...

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

Four Miami-based exiles arrested in Cuba over terror plot

On April 26th, Cuba's government detained four Miami-based Cuban exiles for allegedly planning to attack military stations in Cuba, Reuters reports. According to a statement by Cuba's Interior Ministry, José Ortega Amador, Obdulio Rodríguez González, Raibel Pacheco Santos, and Félix Monzón Álvaro "admitted that they were planning an attack with the objective of inciting violence."

Cuba's government has not explained why it delayed announcement of the arrests until this week: a delay that coincided with the U.S. government's latest report on State Sponsors of Terrorism, which kept Cuba on the list.

According to Cuba's Interior Ministry, the four visited the island on several occasions since mid-2013 to prepare. Cuba Debate also reports that, in 2009, Raibel Pacheco registered a company in the state of Florida named the "Cuban Liberation Force, Inc." based in Hialeah. The company's one blog post explained the organization was founded "at the request of members of the armed forces who are inside Cuba, as well as members of organizations and the people" and that its goal is to "topple the regime," reports the Miami Herald .

The Ministry said that the plan was organized under the direction of three other Miami-based Cuban immigrants, Santiago Álvarez, Fernandez Marina, Osvaldo Mitat, and Manuel Alzugaray.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2006 , Álvarez and Mitat pled guilty to criminal conspiracy in Fort Lauderdale Federal Court in order to avoid more serious charges related to the possession of machine guns, ammunition, and a grenade launcher. Another weapons cache in the Bahamas was linked to Álvarez.

According to press coverage at the time, prosecutors did not directly accuse Álvarez and Mitat of using the weapons to attack Cuba's government, but did present evidence of Álvarez financing a failed 2001 incursion against Fidel Castro, as well as other paramilitary activities. According to the New York Times , Álvarez said that the weapons found "were C.I.A. relics, but were not going to be used in the plots he had hatched with senior Cuban military officers who planned to conspire against the government." Álvarez received a 30-month sentence, while Mitat received a two year sentence. For further background on their case, see here .

Cuba's Interior Ministry claims that Álvarez, Mitat, and Alzugaray "maintain close ties" with Luis Posada Carriles . As the Washington Post wrote during the 2006 trial, "Before his arrest, Álvarez may have been best known for his advocacy on behalf of Luis Posada Carriles, a CIA-trained Cuban immigrant linked to the bombing of a Cuban airliner that killed 73 people in 1976 and to other violent plots. When Posada sought asylum in the United States last year, it was Alvarez who helped present his case to the public."

But, Posada Carriles' attorney, Arturo Hernández, said, "We categorically deny that Luis has absolutely anything to do with this or has any knowledge of any of these individuals who were allegedly arrested in Cuba," reports the Associated Press . Álvarez, Alzugaray, and Mitat also denied any connection to the plot or the individuals arrested.

Only days after publishing the State Sponsors of Terror list, the Department appeared not particularly curious about Cuba's allegation that four Miami-based exiles had visited the island on four occasions to plan a terror plot.

In a press briefing on Wednesday, spokesperson Jen Psaki told reporters that the State Department had no more information than what appeared in the Interior Ministry's statement. No reporter appears to have even asked about it today.

Cuba's Interior Ministry has stated that it will communicate with U.S. authorities regarding the case:

> "The necessary arrangements will be made with the relevant U.S. authorities to investigate these incidents and prevent the actions of terrorist organizations based in that nation from endangering the lives of people and security of both nations."

According to the Associated Press, this is the first specific terrorist threat of its kind that Cuba has reported in years. In 2001, three Cuban-Americans were detained after arriving on the island with guns and ammunition, and 9 years later were prosecuted for alleged plans to place a bomb in Havana's Tropicana nightclub. Cuba's government later released a recording of Álvarez discussing the possible bombing of the nightclub with one of the men in custody, Ihosvani Suris de la Torre.

According to a 2008 report by Kirk Nielsen in Salon , Álvarez claims, "he was not involved in the operation and was only trying to help Suris; he knew the call was being recorded, and that Suris faced the firing squad, so he wanted to say something that would make Suris appear to be providing valuable assistance to his captors."

Four Members of Congress meet with Cuban officials and Alan Gross

Representatives Barbara Lee (CA-13), Gregory Meeks (NY-5), Emanuel Cleaver (MO-5), and Sam Farr (CA-20) have just returned from Cuba following a trip that was led and hosted by the Center for Democracy in the Americas. The delegation met with Cuban officials, including Foreign Minister Bruno Rodríguez and given access to see Alan Gross, reports Reuters . The Members of Congress were also briefed before their departure to Cuba by U.S. officials.

In a press conference that took place in Havana on Monday, the Representatives urged President Obama to negotiate with Cuba's government for the release of Mr. Gross. As Rep. Lee stated:

> "It is time that both countries make a serious commitment to engage in negotiations with no preconditions, and we will communicate that to the White House upon our return."

While in the past Cuba's government has sought to link Alan Gross's release to that of the Cuban Five, Cuban agents jailed in the United States on espionage charges, Scott Gilbert, Gross's attorney, says that Cuba's government has been offering to enter into talks without preconditions for approximately a year. For its part, Reuters reports, the U.S. government has disregarded these offers as merely efforts to secure the release of the Cuban Five. As Rep. Cleaver noted:

> "In the fog of conflict, clear communication is normally the first casualty. And what we have seen since we've been here is that there is a need for clear communication both ways....We understand and we want the world to understand and the people of our country as well as people here in Cuba, we are talking about real human beings. Alan Gross is a real human being with flesh and blood, with family and friends, and this is not some game; this is real life, for all of us."

Crist, candidate for Governor of Florida, plans to visit Cuba this summer

Charlie Crist, former Governor of Florida, who is seeking the Democratic Party's nomination to run against Governor Rick Scott in the November election, announced plans to travel to Cuba this summer, reports Tampa Bay Times . At Versailles Restaurant in Miami's Little Havana, Crist stated:

> "We ought to think big. We ought to lift the embargo on Cuba and work with the President and get things done....We're the gateway to Latin America. We're the gateway to South America....We've got to be doing more and doing better."

Kevin Cate, Crist's campaign spokesperson said :

> "The embargo has done nothing in fifty years to change the regime in Cuba or end the suffering of the Cuban people. Governor Crist is exploring every opportunity to help bring economic freedom and democracy to the people of Cuba."

Crist spoke out against the embargo for the first time in February, making waves in Florida's Cuban-American community. His latest statements reflect a major shift in position. While Governor from 2007 to 2011, he backed U.S. sanctions and created state legislation to crack down on travel agencies doing business with Cuba, the Miami Herald reports. In 2010, he reiterated his support for the embargo, describing the current policy as "responsible."

Crist's opponent in the gubernatorial race, incumbent Governor Rick Scott called the statements "insulting," and has reiterated his support for sanctions. Marc Caputo writing for the Miami Herald notes that Crist's opposition to the embargo could be a plus given the results of a recent Atlantic Council poll which found that 56% of Americans and 63% of Floridians support more direct engagement with Cuba.

Secretary Kerry invites Cuban scientist to attend conference in June ; The AAAS and Cuban Academy of Sciences sign agreement to advance cooperation

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dan Whittle, Director of the Cuba Program at the Environmental Defense Fund, has tweeted that U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry has invited a leading Cuban scientist, reportedly Fabián Pina , to attend the 2014 International Ocean Conference in June. Whittle called Kerry's move "Big news and [a big] step forward."

U.S. regulations have historically made it difficult for U.S. and Cuban scientists to collaborate, but there is growing political space to do more.

Last month, the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS) and the Cuban Academy of Sciences signed a landmark memorandum of understanding to advance scientific cooperation between U.S. and Cuban scientists, reports AAAS . An AAAS-led group of U.S. scientists and policy experts visited Cuba in April for three days to engage in conversations that led to the signing of the agreement. The agreement seeks opportunities for sustained cooperation in the areas of emerging infectious diseases, brain disorders, cancer and antimicrobial drug resistance. John Caulfield, the Chief of Mission of the U.S. Interests Section in Havana, and AAAS President Gerald Fink both expressed support for the visit. Fink remarked:

> "This trip was a wonderful opportunity to reinvigorate the long-standing friendship between U.S. and Cuban scientists and to form a more specific plan of action."

Secretary Kerry talks Cuba at Council of the Americas' 44th Conference on the Americas

In a speech at the Council of the Americas' 44th Conference on the Americas devoted to familiar themes -- education, free trade agreements, small business, and the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions - U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry also discussed Cuba at the end of his remarks :

> "None of us want to see the Cuban people continue to be left behind as the rest of the hemisphere advances. Since 2009, President Obama's Cuba policy has been geared towards loosening the dependence of Cubans on the state and strengthening independent civil society. There's an important overlap between U.S. policy and the emerging micro-entrepreneurial sector in Cuba.
> "President Obama's goal has always been to empower Cubans to freely determine their own futures. And the most effective tool we have to promote this goal is helping to build deeper connections between the Cuban and American peoples. The hundreds of thousands of Cuban Americans who now send remittances and who travel each year under the President's policies, they are critical to ensuring that the Cuban people have more of the opportunities that they deserve."

Other speakers included Roberta Jacobson, Assistant Secretary of State for the Western Hemisphere; Rep. Ed Royce (CA-39), Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and Sen. Tim Kaine (VA), a Member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Visit of Women Entrepreneurs from Latin America kicks off this month

This month the U.S. State Department is hosting twelve women entrepreneurs and women who work for organizations that support female entrepreneurship from Latin America as part of the Women's Entrepreneurship in the Americas (WEAmericas) International Visitor Leadership Program.

As Secretary Kerry mentioned in his Council address, the WEAmericas program was first announced by President Obama at the 2012 Summit of the Americas. The women will visit five U.S. cities, including Washington, D.C., to meet with business leaders and organizations that encourage women leadership and that will provide a network for the Latina entrepreneurs. After the trip, the women will also participate in further training and mentorship activities.

Nidialys Acosta, co-owner of the Nostalgicar car rental company in Cuba, is participating. In November of 2013, Nidialys participated in a conference organized by CDA focusing on economic changes taking place in Cuba and highlighting the experiences of Cuba's growing community of small business owners. CDA is pleased to see women entrepreneurs from Cuba participating in such activities, as we recommended in our most recent book, "Women's Work: Gender Equality in Cuba and the Role of Women Building Cuba's Future."

Illinois corn growers push for expanded trade opportunities with Cuba

The Illinois Corn Growers Association issued a letter urging President Obama to allow for expanded exports to Cuba and to establish an agricultural trade office on the island, reports the AP . "Illinois ranks sixth nationwide in lost trade opportunities because of the financial and travel restrictions," explained Gary Hudson, president of the Illinois Corn Growers Association. Hudson said that Cuba is an ideal destination for Illinois commodities and food products but that U.S. sanctions on Cuba frustrate business opportunities.

For more detail, listen to this WUIS interview with Phil Thornton of the Illinois Corn Growers Association, in which Thornton speaks about the Association's reasons for writing to President Obama about trade with Cuba.

U.S. insurance company, Argentina travel company to pay hefty OFAC fines

A major multinational insurance corporation based in the U.S., American International Group, Inc. (AIG), will pay a $279,038 fine to the Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) for selling insurance policies to Canadian companies and travelers between 2006 and 2009 for their activities in Cuba, reports Bloomberg . OFAC announced the settlement, stating: "AIG, including certain members of the institution's management, had actual knowledge of the conduct. ...The compliance programs of AIG's two Canadian subsidiaries were inadequate." AIG received $182 billion in U.S. government support during the financial crisis.

Decolar.com Inc., a company that operates out of Buenos Aires but was incorporated in the U.S., will pay a $2.8 million fine to OFAC for transactions in violation of U.S. sanctions against Cuba, reports Cuba Standard . According to OFAC , the company provided travel services for trips to Cuba for 17,836 non-U.S. travelers between 2009 and 2012 without first obtaining proper OFAC licensing. The penalty the company will pay OFAC, was reportedly reduced because the company "self-disclosed" the violations.

Last month, we reported that a prominent Dutch travel company agreed to pay a $5.9 million fine to OFAC, one of the largest assigned to a travel company by the U.S. government for embargo violations and part of a pattern of increasingly stringent enforcement.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Cuba and France sign bilateral trade agreement

Fleur Pellerin, France's Secretary of State for Foreign Trade and Tourism, and Cuba's Foreign Trade and Investment Minister, Rodrigo Malmierca, signed a bilateral trade agreement this week that includes the renewal of a short-term line of credit, reports EFE .

The agreement is designed to increase trade between the nations, especially in the food and agriculture sector, according to a statement by France's Foreign Ministry. Secretary Pellerin noted France also sees potential for investment in the Special Development Zone at Mariel Port and is interested in Cuba's health and biotechnology sectors. France is currently Cuba's tenth largest trading partner, and there are approximately 60 French companies doing business in Cuba. Malmierca says the agreement is part of Cuba's greater economic reform plan, which he called an "ideal" moment for expanding trade relations with the European country.

IN CUBA

Further steps taken toward currency unification

Officials from Cuba's state Export-Import Corporation (CIMEX) made statements this week to Juventud Rebelde about the most recent development in Cuba's steps toward unifying its two national currencies -- the Convertible Peso (CUC) and the Cuban Peso (CUP).
In March of this year, two state-run stores in Havana began accepting payment in CUP (in cash or by debit card) for their products priced in CUC at the official exchange rate of 1 CUC - 25 CUP on an experimental basis. Starting this month, Cuba's state enterprises now plan to implement this system countrywide, with the goal of making the changes in 28 large commercial centers throughout the island, followed by smaller establishments. Bárbara Soto Sánchez, the Vice President of CIMEX told Juventud Rebelde that she anticipates there will be at least one commercial center per province accepting payment in CUP for products priced in CUC by the end of May.

Though the commercial enterprises in question will begin accepting both currencies, they will continue to maintain all internal accounting and banking in CUC. According to the officials, measures are intended to give Cubans more payment options.

In October 2013 , Cuba's Council of Ministers agreed to put into effect a timeline for measures, originally approved by the 6th Congress of the Communist Party in April 2011, to end the country's dual currency system. The measures call for monetary and exchange rate unification with "careful preparation and execution."

The dual currency system has existed since 1994, when Cuba legalized the U.S. dollar. Subsequently, the dollar was circulated in tandem with the CUP until being replaced in 2004 by the CUC. The CUC was created as a form of national hard currency pegged to the dollar, functioning as the main tender in tourism and international trade, while the CUP is used for the most part to pay state salaries. Cubans have since continued to receive their official state salaries in CUP. That rate is subsidized for state entities, making the two currencies equal in official sector transactions.

Cuban human rights organization reports record number of short-term arrests this year

The Cuban Commission for Human Rights and National Reconciliation (CCDHRN) reported a record 3,821 short-term arrests which it considered to be politically motivated in the first four months of 2014, reports Miami Herald . The numbers were reported by Elizardo Sánchez, the commission's president. Sánchez has not released further information on how he arrived at the figure and the Miami Herald has not independently verified his report. Cuba's government considers the Commission illegal and counterrevolutionary. In March, CCDHRN reported 1,051 arrests which it considered to be politically motivated during the month of February.

Income tax established for Mariel Special Development Zone workers; Some 23 international investors interested in Mariel

Workers hired at the Mariel Special Development Zone will have to pay a 5% income tax, reports state news outlet ACN . The income tax will be retained by employment agencies and will be contributed to the state budget. Workers will initially receive payment at a rate of 10 Cuban pesos to every dollar, but this exchange rate will be subject to revision during the first quarter of every year while the country undergoes the process of unifying its two currencies. Details and past coverage on payment for workers can be found in Cuba Standard.

The Regulatory Bureau of the Mariel Special Development Zone reports that around 23 international investors have expressed interest in developing projects at the Mariel port. Aspiring investors from countries such as France, Spain, Italy, Brazil, Russia, China, and Holland have submitted documentation to the Bureau. The prospective projects range from the pharmaceutical and biotechnology industries to food, agriculture and automobiles.

Subject:	how we just changed an entire Governor's race in 48 hours--without any fingerprints

Dear Investors & Key Advisors,

Wanted to send you a quick update...

As you may have heard with the hard work of the folks at ProgressNow Colorado as part of Colorado's "communication hub" they dug up weeks ago and carefully passed on information to the mainstream media on how the leading GOP candidate for Governor, former Congressman Scott McInnis plagiarized a report he provided on water policy for a foundation in Colorado.

In the past 48 hours, McInnis and the entire Republican party of Colorado are in free-fall. There are now calls even within the Republican party for McInnis to withdraw.

The best part is that ProgressNow Colorado nor any of our allies had their fingerprints on any of the excellent behind-the-scenes work to develop and then break this story. This has led to three straight days of front page Denver Post coverage as well as the editorial below and statewide media, a share of which is linked to below.

If you want to discuss how PN can be of further help to you in other states, please let me know a good time and number to reach you.

Best,

Mike

EDITORIAL
McInnis should throw in the towel

After revelations of plagiarism and other cases of questionable judgment, it's clear the GOP candidate is not fit to be governor.

By The Denver Post
POSTED: 07/14/2010 01:00:00 AM MDT

Revelations of extensive plagiarism in work that gubernatorial candidate Scott McInnis claimed as his own call into question his fitness for public office.

The lifted work, examined in The Denver Post, constitutes inexcusable intellectual thievery. It is so damaging that we believe McInnis ought to drop out of the race.

Colorado's next governor should be a person of integrity, a trusted hand to lead the state through difficult times.

The Post revealed in Tuesday's paper that McInnis was paid to write essays on water in 2005 and 2006 yet turned in writings that had been plagiarized. Now we learn he did the same thing in a 1994 op-ed in the Rocky Mountain News.

We were astonished Tuesday to hear McInnis, in an interview with 9News, call the revelations over his water essays a "non-issue." Later, he did tell us he had made a mistake and that he should have checked the material. Yes, he should have.

The Hasan Family Foundation paid McInnis $300,000 over two years to give talks on water issues and write original, monthly articles on the topic. The plagiarism detailed by Post reporter Karen E. Crummy is extensive.

McInnis says he hired a consultant to serve as an expert for the writings. Yet the foundation hired McInnis as the expert, and McInnis' work never mentioned the help of anyone else. It was presented as his own.

The written work he submitted to the foundation included numerous instances of passages that were copied, with few changes, from scholarly work originated by Gregory J. Hobbs, who is now a Colorado Supreme Court justice.

The former congressman was paid handsomely for work that he said was "original and not reprinted from any other source." It was McInnis' obligation to ensure that was true.

Unfortunately, this is not the first time we've had questions about McInnis' judgment.

During his final term in Congress, he paid his wife $37,000 to be his campaign manager — even though he already had decided he wasn't going to run for re-election.

As we said in 2004, the arrangement "smacks of bad judgment."

More recently, we were taken aback by McInnis' refusal to release tax forms, even though Colorado's gubernatorial candidates since 1998 routinely have done so.

What is he hiding?

McInnis' financial records are pertinent information. Detractors have characterized him as a "lawyer-lobbyist," and we think voters have a right to know how he has made his money.

We've also been puzzled by McInnis' inability — or refusal, it's difficult to know which — to provide detail on his philanthropy even though he claims to have been generous to individuals down on their luck.

The best specific example he could come up with was having given the meat of a dead elk to a family in need. Equally odd was his failure to recall being a member of an advisory board for a pro-choice GOP group.

The plagiarism and other issues have cumulatively so damaged McInnis' credibility that we do not believe he can be an effective governor. Even though McInnis acknowledged he made a mistake, he still spent part of Tuesday blaming a research assistant for the failure to credit the work.

If you put your name on something and take money for it — a lot of money in this case — it is your responsibility to make rock-solid sure it is bona fide, original work that will stand up to scrutiny.

The state's chief executive must be someone Coloradans can believe in as the state suffers a stretch of tight budgets and a struggling economy.

If Scott McInnis cannot be trusted to turn in what amounts to an overpaid term paper — without plagiarizing someone else's work — there is no way he can be relied upon to guide Colorado through these complicated times.

Storm over possible plagiarism in McInnis writings escalates

A new example of possible plagiarism by Scott McInnis surfaced Tuesday as the Republican gubernatorial candidate faced calls to repay $300,000 he received for plagiarized essays on water that he submitted as "original works."

A Denver Post review of McInnis' floor speeches and columns published during his congressional career found striking similarities between a 1995 speech and 1994 column by McInnis and a previously published Op-Ed in The Washington Post.

"There is a growing popular belief in South Korea that the North has outmaneuvered Washington and marginalized the South's role," wrote Richard V. Allen and Daryl M. Plunk in a Washington Post Op-Ed published Nov. 9, 1994.

Six weeks later, McInnis wrote in the Rocky Mountain News: "There is growing South Korean sentiment that North Korea has outmaneuvered Washington and marginalized the South's input into this issue."

A month after that, he made the same statement on the House floor with only minor alteration.

McInnis has declined interview requests from The Denver Post since the paper first reported that the "Musings on Water" articles he submitted to the Hasan Family Foundation as "original works" included passages that were similar to or copied directly from a 1984 essay by now-Colorado Supreme Court Justice Gregory Hobbs.

Sean Duffy, spokesman for the McInnis campaign, declined to comment on the new findings Tuesday afternoon, saying that the two hours he had to look into The Post's comparison was not enough time to discover how the similarities may have occurred.

"We got faulty research"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McInnis on Tuesday declared the plagiarism of the water essays a "non-issue" that Colorado voters don't care about.

Although his campaign manager put out a statement late Monday saying McInnis believes the "buck stops" with him, McInnis spent Tuesday asserting that he failed only in that he did not monitor his research assistant closely enough.

"We got faulty research," McInnis told 9News. "This is a nonissue if it's not a political year. Voters don't really care about this issue. They care about jobs, getting back to work."

McInnis also told 9News he expected there were numerous other problems with the water essays he submitted as his own work.

Rolly Fischer, a former engineer who McInnis said was responsible for lifting paragraphs and at least four full pages from work written by Colorado Supreme Court Justice Gregory Hobbs, denied the charge.

"Scott's responsible for it," he said to the Glenwood Springs Post-Independent, and then declined to comment further.

Contacted by a Denver Post reporter at his home Tuesday, Fischer declined to comment, saying, "I don't trust the press."

In a statement released late Monday, Hasan Family Foundation board chair Seeme Hasan, a Republican, said: "At no time was it brought to our attention that Mr. McInnis used information not cited or unethically used work that was not his own."

She continued: "All work was represented to be original and final. . . . If the allegations are proven to be true, we will demand Mr. McInnis return all monies paid to him by the Foundation."

Dr. Malik Hasan, a foundation board member, also has said McInnis should return the money.

"All the articles are original"

McInnis has not disclosed whether he paid Fischer, how much he was paid and during what time period. McInnis also did not definitively answer questions about whether he would repay the $300,000.

"We'll make it right," he told 9News.

The Hasan Family Foundation paid McInnis $150,000 a year for a 24-month fellowship from 2005 through 2006. McInnis wrote 23 articles totaling 150 pages on water and public-land issues.

In a memo to Seeme Hasan, he said: "All the articles are original and not reprinted from any other source." He also said that the foundation had "the final form of the series."

McInnis now says he didn't intend the articles to be published until after he edited them one more time. They were not posted online by the foundation until after McInnis began his run for governor.

The new example shows clear similarities in both ideas and language between McInnis' 1994 column and his 1995 floor speech and the Washington Post piece. Allen and Plunk in the Op-Ed refer to an agreement between the U.S. and North Korea as "the beginning of the end of a perilous nuclear crisis."

The identical language is found in McInnis' column and floor speech. A search of the Nexis news database finds that the phrase was not used anywhere else in print beyond the Post and McInnis columns.

The Washington Post Op-Ed calls for the "North to resume substantive, high-level talks with Seoul immediately." That exact phrase is also used in McInnis' column and floor speech.

The 150 pages McInnis wrote during his fellowship also contain exact phrases first published two decades earlier.

Earlier Tuesday, House Speaker Terrance Carroll, D-Denver, called on McInnis to immediately drop out of the race, saying he "lacks the integrity" to be governor.

Duffy, the McInnis campaign spokesman, said the speaker is simply trying to distract voters from more important issues. "If I were Speaker Carroll and I had the legislative record that he had in terms of raising taxes and killing jobs, I'd want to change the subject too," he said.

Bar discipline possible

McInnis' opponent in the Republican primary, Dan Maes, said McInnis should take responsibility for the plagiarism.

"If your name is on it, you have to take ownership of it," he said.

Speaking with the Denver Post Editorial Board in advance of his State of the City address, McInnis' potential Democratic opponent, Denver Mayor John Hickenlooper, said that while he didn't know all the facts, the reports of plagiarism "create a cloud."

McInnis, a former congressman and a lawyer on leave from Hogan Lovells (formerly Hogan & Hartson), could face discipline from the Colorado Bar, said legal ethics professor Rebecca Aviel at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct prohibit "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

"The rule covers attorney conduct even when it does not pertain to a client or particular case," she said, noting that the rules are "under enforced."

Summary of Shift: The revelation that McCain was not in the so-called 'cone of silence,' a room promised by Pastor Rick Warren to shield the candidates from hearing their opponent's questions and answers during the forum Saturday, ruled the political coverage today. McCain campaign manager Rick Davis attempted to use the controversy as fodder to attack NBC, saying the network is "abandoning non-partisan coverage of the presidential race." While Davis made the charge because Andrea Mitchell mentioned the Obama camp's concerns relating to this issue Sunday, most networks today covered the story on its merits of McCain possibly cheating, rather than whether NBC is biased. The Georgia-Russia conflict continues to be in the news, with some coverage of McCain's pro-Georgia remarks in Florida this morning. The reporting on the announcement of Pakistan President Musharraf's upcoming resignation has not yet included commentary on McCain's outspoken support for the leader. As the nominating conventions near, there is increasing running mate speculation on every network

Non-political news is centered on the tropical storm hitting Florida. Other stories include the daily Michael Phelps puff piece, a flying car invention, a dam collapsing in Arizona, and a baby bear being rescued in California.

Bob Barr Attacks McCain's Georgia Policy As 'Simplistic', Like Bush (FNC 08/18/08 4:30pm)

NEIL CAVUTO: So you find Senator McCain's approach to this bad, why?

BOB BARR: Well it's very simplistic. Either that or he really doesn't have a firm grasp on the geopolitics and ethnic and demographic problems in that part of the world. He seems to feel similar to what George Bush felt a number of years ago, that Putin could be trusted because he had looked into his eyes and saw a man he could trust. Senator McCain seems to be falling into that same simplistic mode if you meet somebody and know them, they're trustworthy and we're their friend and you need to support them. We're not all Georgians simply because there is a very serious problem and we ought to be concerned about and we ought to be monitoring very carefully between Russia and Georgia does not be any stretch of the imagination mean that we ought to becoming involved and that clearly seems to be direction that both this administration and Senator McCain are going. Ralph Reed Dismisses Absence From McCain Fundraiser; Discussion Of McCain And Women Voters (FNC 08/18/08 5:47pm)

ED HILL: The Obama camp is claiming that you were scratched from the McCain fundraiser tonight. Is that accurate?

RALPH REED: No, not true. I'm in Washington – had meetings that had been scheduled for quite some time. I'm strongly supporting Senator McCain, proud to do so for his record for lower taxes, stronger families, and a 26 prolife voting record in Congress.

HILL: Okay let's go off that. Dee Dee I want to ask you, why does it, according to the latest Pew poll that I took a look at, say that John McCain is having such a tough time getting women to say they'll vote for him.

DEE DEE MYERS: He is having a tough time getting women to say they'll vote for him, and I think he'll have a tough time getting them to actually vote for him come November. Because he's simply-two reasons, he's wrong on a lot of issues that women care about, from the issue of choice, to issues like the environment, to healthcare- he doesn't have a health care plan that seems to really address women's health care concerns and I think that as women are watching these two candidates, Senator McCain becomes really animated and most alive when he's talking about military policy, things like that. It's not that that's the only thing that he maybe- have a plan for, but he only seems to really care about foreign policy, military policy. It's not that women don't care about those things, but they don't see that same passion when he's talking about what he's going to do to improve the economy. I think a lot of women feel that they're on the edge as the economy is sort of bordering on recession. […]

Fox News Pundits Discuss Cone of Silence-gate; Tout McCain's Performance In Civil Forum (FNC 08/18/08 6:46pm)

BILL KRISTOL: As Andrea Mitchell says, these charges or suggestions are being made by the Obama campaign because they know their man lost the evening. They didn't strike them that things can go on they have to pretend that some how McCain must have cheated to have won and I think that says something perhaps about the Obama campaign's excessive regard for their man and their disdain for Senator McCain. McCain won the evening, but look if they want to say that this is because McCain somehow got access to these questions, as if that would have mattered any way, not that he did apparently, McCain should say tomorrow fine let's do it again. I'm serious he should say let's have another forum the next day. We can have it on the same topic, we can have it on Georgia and Russia, we can have it on Iraq, and you know what? I'll go first. I'll go first so Senator Obama can see the questions and the answers. I think the Obama campaign has set itself up for looking like whiners and I hope Senator McCain challenges Obama to have another forum tomorrow.

JEFF BIRNBAUM: […] Just in quick defense of Andrea Mitchell for just one quick second, she didn't say, she did not, she was not – did not report that McCain was not in the cone of silence.

BRET BAIER: No but the Obama people were-

BIRNBAUM: So she, the attack by the McCain campaign on NBC I think had something to do with something else. Maybe some problems they've been having or an eagerness to call attention to this particular forum that McCain clearly won […]

Schuster Slams McCain's Bear DNA Line (MSNBC 08/18/08 7:05pm)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DAVID SCHUSTER: At the Saddleback church forum on Saturday, one of John McCain's loudest applause lines came when he slammed pork barrel spending and one project in particular.

JOHN MCCAIN: We spent money in ways that mortgaged our kids' futures. My friends, we spent three million dollars of your money to study the DNA of bears in Montana. I don't know if that was a paternity issue or a criminal issue. But the point is, it was three million of your money. It was your money.

SCHUSTER: Your money. That's a pretty good line. The problem is, it didn't keep John from voting in favor of the project as part of a larger spending bill. Yes. Back in 2003, McCain could have tried to block the project through an amendment or other procedural means, but he didn't. And McCain ultimately voted for the spending bill with the bear DNA study funding in tact.

Highlight #5
Schuster on McCain's Pro-War Foreign Policy Stance (MSNBC 08/18/08 7:05pm)

SCHUSTER: I want to play a sound bite that gives us a sort of roadmap as to the strategic battlefield that John McCain wants right now. It's about foreign policy and belittling Barack Obama. [...]

JOHN MCCAIN: Behind all these claims and positions by Senator Obama lies the ambition to be president. What's less apparent is the judgment to be commander and chief. And in matters of national security, good judgment will be at a premium in the term of the next president, as we were all reminded ten days ago by the events in the nation of Georgia.

SCHUSTER: Christian, as the tensions in Russia ratchet up and go the other way, doesn't that help John McCain?

CHRISTIAN FREELAND: Absolutely. I think the Georgia crisis has been very, very good for John McCain. You know, for one thing, he was right. I think the Georgia crisis shows that McCain's hawkish line on Russia and Putin, which is not a new thing. He hasn't flip-flopped here. He's been very consistent- has turned out to be presient. And I think because he had that view [...] he was faster than anyone, including the White House off the mark. So I think he's done well on the issue, and I think that's given him some confidence. [...]

MICHAEL CROWLY: [...] It's kind of amazing the gall of John McCain to be organizing his campaign around foreign policy judgment, when he supported this war that really turned out to be a disaster and incredibly unpopular with the American public. [...]

SCHUSTER: And the other thing is that John McCain was certainly far out in the front in terms of even President Bush when this first erupted, and there are also all those questions about John McCain's foreign policy adviser and the lobbying that he has done on behalf of Georgia, and whether there's some sort of conflict in interest there.

Olbermann on McCain's Eagerness on Iraq (MSNBC 08/18/08 8:13pm)

KEITH OLBERMANN: At the same in the campaign the presumptive republican presidential nominee ripped the presumptive democratic presidential nominee, for bad judgment about Iraq, the New York Times reminded the nation that John McCain's immediate response to 9/11 was to threaten Iraq and Saddam Hussein. Within hours of the attack, Senator McCain reciting a laundry list of other countries that supported terrorism, including Iraq, and a month later Senator McCain warning Iraq is the first country. By January 2002, telling sailors and airman onboard the deck an aircraft carrier, 'next up, Baghdad'. Yet today, Senator McCain criticizing his opponent's record on Iraq, ratcheting up his rhetoric in an address to the convention of Veterans of Foreign Wars, criticizing Obama's shifting positions on the troop surge in Iraq.

JOHN MCCAIN: Senator Obama still can't quite bring himself to admit his own failure in judgment. Nor, has he been willing to hee the guidance of General Patreus, one of the great leaders in military history, or to listen to our troops on the ground when they say, as they have said to me on my trip to Iraq, 'let us win, just let us win'. In short, both candidates in this election pledged to end this war, and bring our troops home. The great difference is that I intend to win it first."

Highlight #7
Olbermann on McCain's Lack of Support for Veterans (MSNBC 08/18/08 8:13pm)

KEITH OLBERMANN: Though victory in Iraq is finally in sight, you told the VFW today, Senator McCain, a great deal still depends on the decisions and good judgment of the next president. The hard-won gains by our troops hang in the balance. The lasting advantage of a peaceful and democratic ally in the heart of the Middle East could still be squandered by hasty withdrawal, and arbitrary timelines. [...] Senator McCain, on the 22nd of May, 2003 you said of Iraq, on the Senate floor "We won a massive victory in a few weeks, and we did so with very limited loss of American and allied lives. We were able to end aggression with minimum overall loss of life, and we were even able to greatly reduce the civilian casualties of Afghani and Iraqi citizens."
Senator, you declared victory in Iraq nearly five years and three months ago. Today you say, "Victory in Iraq is finally in sight". The victory you already proclaimed five years ago? [...] In June of 2003, with even Fox News noting, 'Many argue that the conflict in Iraq isn't over. ' You answered, "Well, then why was there a banner that said 'Mission Accomplished' on the aircraft carrier? Look the 'I have said a long time that reconstruction of Iraq would be a long, long difficult process, but the conflict' the major conflict is over, the regime change has been accomplished, and it's very appropriate.'
The senator also foolishly invoked his opponent in that speech today. He told the convention today, ' I suppose from my opponents' vantage point, veterans' concerns are just one more issue to be spun or worked to advantage. This would explain why he has also taken liberties with my position on the GI Bill.... As a political proposition it would have been much easier for me to have just signed on to what I considered flawed legislation. But the people of Arizona, and of all America, expect more from their representatives than that, and instead I sough a better bill. I'm proud to say that the result is a law that better serves our military, better serves military families, and better serves the interests of our country.
Senator McCain spoke out against that very bill last May. On the asinine premise that the awards to our heroes in it were so good, that it did not encourage them to stay in the service. [...] Moreover, Senator McCain missed 10 of the 14 votes on Iraq up to middle of last year, this year he has missed them all. Including one just to honor the sacrifice of the fallen. He has voted to table or oppose 20 million dollars for veterans' healthcare facilities, 322 million dollars for safety equipment for our troops in Iraq, 430 million dollars for veterans outpatient care, 1 billion dollars in new equipment for the national guard, and in separate votes 1billion 500 million dollars in additional veterans medical care to be created by closing tax loopholes.

Amid what some election prognosticators consider a less than favorable outlook for the upcoming midterm elections, it has been a tough few months for Democrats.

The best news for the Democratic Party right now, though, is that it appears the odds that Hillary Clinton will be running for president again are increasing.

Everyone, including this columnist, has long assumed that she will run. And most, including this columnist, think she will be the best person for this job. Many more again, once more including me, were never concerned as to whether she is the best person for this job. My only question about this campaign has been whether it will have the right message to get the job.

Based on excellent reporting by Dylan Scott at Talking Points Memo, I can now enthusiastically report to you that she not only has the right message, she has the perfect message.

For all of the coverage that the former secretary of State and former first lady has gotten in the past few months, Scott's analysis of Clinton's message is good music to these ears. President Obama did not just help this economy during his administration, he saved it from unthinkable consequences. After 54 months straight of private-sector job growth, Clinton appears determined to keep the momentum going and to finish the job of economic recovery.

If Obama saved the economy, Clinton will grow the economy, for everyone. She noted, "we know unless we change our policies, a lot of the benefits are not going to be broadly shared" — a signal that Clinton is prepared to shift focus to a segment of the economy and the population that has been neglected for too long.

What has always made the Clintons great politicians and better people is their unyielding commitment to expanding the middle class for everyone. Well, Hillary Clinton is right on message in saying, "Forget about getting rich. I'm talking about getting into the middle class and staying there."

The overarching message from the former secretary of State is an idea of finishing the job. We have an economic recovery that brought us back from peril, but for many Americans it still hasn't recovered, and that is priority No. 1 for Clinton's campaign.

It is a joyous feeling not to be for Hillary Clinton just out of loyalties to her or the Clintons as a whole but because I know that she has what it takes to get the job done. Now I am more convinced than ever that she know what it takes. She is the right person at the right time with the right message. This is rarely the case in politics, but it is now, and hallelujah for that.

FROM MEDIA MATTERS FOR AMERICA: Media Matters for America: "Conservative Media Attack Clinton Allies In Desperate Ploy To Smear Her Over Benghazi"

By Oliver Willis

September 23, 2014, 4:38 p.m. EDT

Conservative media are lashing out at individuals who have worked with and support Hillary Clinton to attack her by proxy and rehash tired Benghazi smears.

Fox News has repeatedly -- and falsely -- suggested that the Obama administration's response to the September 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi, Libya was somehow politically calibrated. According to a Media Matters analysis, in the 20 months following the attacks Fox's evening programming aired 230 total segments suggesting the response to the attacks was motivated by President Obama's re-election campaign, while 105 segments linked Benghazi to Clinton's potential presidential campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As part of their politicized Benghazi campaign, conservative media have repeatedly attacked Clinton's colleagues and friends in the hopes of weakening a potential Clinton presidential run.

Cheryl Mills, Clinton's chief of staff at the State Department, has long been subject to attacks. Back in June 2013, a Daily Caller op-ed by conservative activist Tom Fitton dubbed her the "Clinton cover-up expert," and accused her of attempting to "silence" a Benghazi whistleblower. (Multiple investigations have found no evidence of a Benghazi "cover-up," and the so-called whistleblower himself admitted that all Mills had done was speak to him in an "unhappy" tone.)

But now Mills, and her colleague former deputy chief of staff Jake Sullivan, have come under a fresh round of attacks. Earlier this month, Fox and discredited journalist Sharyl Attkisson hyped claims from a disgruntled former State Department employee who speculated that Mills and Sullivan were involved in the removal of damaging documents from a Benghazi investigation. The employee had no evidence -- he just "couldn't help but wonder" if wrongdoing had occurred. Fox blew up his unsupported allegations to claim that "Clinton allies removed politically damaging docs," while The New York Post labeled Mills and Sullivan "Clinton's minions" and claimed the documents were "scrubbed to protect Hillary."

Attkisson's claims were repeated across conservative media, including at Breitbart, HotAir, and Townhall. At the same time, the Media Research Center complained that more of the mainstream media didn't cover the story (despite the lack of evidence).

Earlier this summer, conspiracy theorist Aaron Klein's anti-Clinton book The REAL Benghazi Story attempted to smear another Clinton ally: former CIA deputy director Michael Morell. Klein suggested that Morell was "given" his new job at the consulting firm Beacon Global Strategies (co-founded by Philippe Reines, a Clinton adviser), "in exchange for his silence in the talking points scandal." Of course, there was no talking points "scandal": multiple investigations have found the talking points that then-U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Susan Rice was given ahead of media appearances following the Benghazi attacks were edited to preserve an ongoing criminal investigation, not for any nefarious political reasons. Morell, as a CIA official, helped sign off on the final draft, as did the intelligence community.

Other figures at Beacon Global, including Reines, Andrew Shapiro, Admiral James Stavridis, and J. Michael Allen have also come under attack from the right-wing press. The Blaze recently labeled the group "Benghazi Alumni," and accused them of previously participating in "harassment, demotions and politicized cover-ups." The Blaze piece, and a recent opinion piece in The Buffalo News by columnist Douglas Turner, both accused Beacon figures of hiding evidence about the so-called "stand down" order.

This claim is an old Benghazi falsehood; every single investigation, including the GOP-led House Intelligence Committee, have confirmed that there was no "stand down" order given to military or CIA personnel the night of the attacks. Military personnel along the chain of command have also said that any no such order was given.

Right-wing media's obsession with trying to tie Benghazi to a potential Clinton 2016 presidential run is habitually focused on throwing mud against the wall in the hopes that something sticks, but the facts won't allow it.

Associated Press: "Hillary Clinton Highlights Gender As 2016 Looms"

By Ken Thomas

September 23, 2014, 5:05 p.m. EDT

Hillary Rodham Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign emphasized her experience, competence and preparation to become president. Her 2016 pitch could be simpler: She'd be the first female president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Clinton considers a second White House bid in 2016, she is making a pronounced case for female empowerment and the role of women in the nation's economy and politics. From the stage of the annual Clinton Global Initiative to the campaign trail, the former secretary of state has emphasized breaking barriers and the need for female leadership — themes that could resonate in a future campaign in which women voters will be critical.

"Don't let anyone dismiss what you're doing today as women's work," Clinton told a women's leadership forum last week at the Democratic National Committee. "Don't let anyone send you back to the sidelines."

Along with her husband, former President Bill Clinton, the former first lady spent the week highlighting the role of women leaders this week at their family's annual conference. The ex-president spoke to Chilean President Michelle Bachelet about the challenges female leaders face. Other panels featured General Motors CEO Mary Barra and IBM CEO Ginni Rometty, the first female heads at their respective companies.

Mrs. Clinton is raising money for Democratic women running in the 2014 elections and is expected to campaign for Democrats in the coming weeks. In Iowa, she praised Democratic congressional candidate Staci Appel, noting that the early presidential state has never elected a woman to Congress or governor.

During her DNC speech last week, Clinton rattled off the names of 10 Democratic women whom she said gave her hope, from candidates for governor like Mary Burke of Wisconsin and Wendy Davis of Texas to Sens. Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, Kay Hagan of North Carolina and Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire.

The former New York senator's remarks frequently touch on a number of policy issues important to woman. Clinton called for a "movement" to bring equal pay, access to child care and raising the minimum wage, reminding her audience that two-thirds of minimum wage earners are women.

Anytime she is introduced, speakers invariably mention Clinton's 1995 United Nations speech in Beijing, when she declared that "human rights are women's rights and women's rights are human rights."

Her campaign message to women wasn't always so explicit; her advisers were concerned that being a woman could hurt her with male voters.

When Clinton sought the presidency in 2007 and 2008, her team presented her as a strong leader — in the mold of the late British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher — with the toughness and experience to lead the nation. One of her most memorable television ads involved a 3 a.m. phone call, which implied her Democratic primary opponent, Barack Obama, wasn't ready to respond to a crisis.

But when she ended her campaign amid praise for her tenacity, Clinton gave what might have been a preview of her approach to the gender question, noting she hadn't shattered the White House's glass ceiling, but had left 18 million cracks in it — a reference to the votes she won in the primaries.

Six years later, one of her main priorities at the Clinton Foundation is a project called, "No Ceilings," aimed at empowering women around the planet.

"There may be new attention to these issues, especially as we've plateaued in some important indicators, but she proposed universal (pre-kindergarten) and national paid leave in '07 and '08 and those issues have only gained in importance in the last few years," said Neera Tanden, a former Clinton policy adviser who leads the Center for American Progress.

In a nod to her past, Clinton's speeches now often include anecdotes emblematic of the barriers many women have faced in the work force.

When she was deciding between Yale and Harvard law schools, Clinton recalled attending a reception at Harvard, where she met a chauvinistic law professor who told her the school didn't need more women. Clinton enrolled at Yale.

At a speech last week to the Legal Services Corp., Clinton recalled meeting an Arkansas judge shortly after moving to the state to teach law and run a legal aid clinic in the 1970s. "I don't have much use for lady law professors and I have no use for legal aid," the judge told Clinton, who responded: "Well, it's great to meet you, judge!"

Before she makes any decisions on her future, Clinton will take on another role. The couple's daughter, Chelsea, is expecting her first child within days and the former first lady has been eagerly anticipating becoming a grandmother.

"When the big moment comes," Clinton said in Iowa, "you can bet that I will drop everything to be there in a flash."

Politico: "Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton: It's complicated"

By Maggie Haberman

September 23, 2014, 7:12 p.m. EDT

Just over a year ago at the request of the White House, Hillary Clinton worked the phones with about a half-dozen senators, trying to sell Congress on authorizing military strikes against Syria. Weeks later, at the Clinton Global Initiative, the former secretary of state defended President Barack Obama against Republican efforts to defund his health care overhaul.

Since then, the relationship has become more complicated: During her summer book tour, Clinton pointedly highlighted differences with her former boss over how the early stages of the Syria civil war were handled.

On Tuesday, Clinton and Obama were together again at the Clinton Global Initiative in Midtown Manhattan, the seventh time the sitting president has attended the glitzy charity-meets-ideas event. Former President Bill Clinton praised Obama, and the president offered kind words for both Clintons. The joint appearance highlighted a reality for the current president and his former secretary of state: Her political needs aren't always in sync with his, but more often than not their interests do align.

Hillary Clinton needs to keep Obama's supporters behind her if she runs for president in 2016. After Clinton was quoted in The Atlantic last month knocking Obama's foreign policy mantra — "'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," she said — a few days later she issued a statement declaring her deep support for the president and insisting she wasn't trying to attack him.

Some Obama advisers, meanwhile, see Clinton as a lifeline — the best chance the lame-duck Democrat has to preserve his legacy, particularly Obamacare, after the open-seat election in 2016.

Whether Obama himself views the situation that way is unclear. But so far, a number of former Obama aides have made an effort to show unity between the two sides.

And so it was all compliments between Obama and the Clintons onstage Tuesday.

"It's a testimony I think to any leader not just what they themselves do, but the degree to which they inspire actions from others," Obama told the audience. "Bill Clinton has continued to exert extraordinary global leadership for decades."

As for Hillary Clinton, sitting in the audience at a table at the Sheraton New York, Obama said, "I think one of the best decisions I ever made as president was to have Hillary Clinton serve as our secretary of state. … I'll always be grateful for her extraordinary leadership … around the world."

At another point, Obama talked about his foreign policy and described Clinton as someone who "helped champion our efforts" from her position at the State Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama also joked about lending the Clintons' very pregnant daughter his motorcade to get to the hospital and made an offhand aside about his feelings of guilt at sending Hillary Clinton so many miles around the world, away from her husband, for a four-year stretch. Looking weary, Obama quipped that Hillary Clinton has the out-of-office "glow."

There was no mention of the current crisis in Syria, where Obama ordered air strikes to combat the fast-growing terror group known as Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant the night before. In an interview on CNBC earlier Tuesday, Bill Clinton said he thinks the U.S. military engagement will be extensive but will not result in a land war. Hillary Clinton would not comment on what's happening in the Mideast.

The CGI event is intended to be apolitical, and Bill Clinton has invited Republicans as featured speakers in the past. But the sense that the Democrats' balance of political power is about to shift to Clinton was palpable all over the Sheraton. Longtime Clinton donors roamed the lobby along with people like Buffy Wicks, a former Obama aide who is currently executive director of Priorities USA Action, the pro-Obama super PAC that has been rebranded as a pro-Clinton effort for 2016.

Another change since last year's CGI event: Donors then were excited about the prospect of Hillary Clinton running again but thought believed they had to persuade her to. This year, it is viewed as a foregone conclusion, even though Clinton says she hasn't made up her mind and won't announce a decision until after the new year.

Bill Clinton, as ever, was probed for his political views throughout the event. In an interview with Charlie Rose taped Monday, he was asked the five things the next president will need to tackle in the first 100 days.

He ticked off a few items, such as infrastructure and continuing to work on health care. But Bill Clinton led with reversing economic stagnation in the country.

The main concern is the "recovery of our capacity to provide a society that offers equal opportunity and the possibility of shared prosperity," Bill Clinton said. "An expanding middle class where poor people have the chance to work their way into it."

It's a message his wife is likely to focus on over the next two years — by reminding voters that her husband's White House was notable for just that type of prosperity.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Obama: 'I still have a lot of debt to pay' to Hillary Clinton"

By Katie Zezima

September 23, 2014, 4:46 p.m. EDT

President Obama said Tuesday "one of the best decisions" he made in office "was to ask Hillary Clinton to serve as our nation's secretary of state."

"I'll always be grateful for her extraordinary leadership representing our nation around the world," he said at the Clinton Global Initiative in New York. "And I still have a lot of debt to pay" to his former secretary of state because her frenetic schedule -- the State Department said she traveled 956,733 miles in the position -- kept the Clintons apart.

"Hillary put in a lot of miles during her tenure as secretary of state. She has the post-administration glow right now," Obama said. "She looks much more rested."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, with the 2016 race just around the corner, that may be a temporary condition.

Obama thanked Bill Clinton for his "friendship and leadership" -- and offered something in return.

There may be no presidential perk more envied -- at least by gridlock-plagued New Yorkers -- than the official motorcade. When you're commander-in-chief, forget traffic -- you don't have to worry about traffic lights, either.

And so Obama offered a very pregnant Chelsea Clinton a lift to the hospital should she go into labor during his remarks. "I was just discussing with President Clinton that if Chelsea begins delivery while I'm speaking, she has my motorcade and will be able to navigate traffic," Obama said. "Because actually, it's pretty smooth for me during the week. I don't know what the problem is. Everybody hypes the traffic, but I haven't noticed."

A motorcade does tend to smooth that out.

Obama came onstage after Matt Damon. Even if you're president, that's not an easy act to follow.

"Always wonderful to follow Matt Damon," Obama said. "I saw people trickling out after he was done."

The Hill: "Obama: Making Hillary Clinton secretary of State one of my 'best decisions'"

By Justin Sink

September 23, 2014, 3:20 p.m. EDT

Asking Hillary Clinton to serve as Secretary of State was "one of the best decisions I ever made as president," President Obama told philanthropists and donors gathered Tuesday at the Clinton Global Initiative meeting in New York City.

The president showered the former first lady — and likely frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination — with praise, saying he "will always be grateful for her extraordinary leadership."

Obama went on to joke that he still had "a lot of debt to pay" because of the miles Clinton traveled when in his administration. But he also praised the former New York senator for her "post-administration glow."

"She looks much more rested," Obama said to laughter.

The praise came at the first joint public appearance for Obama and his former Cabinet secretary since Clinton's interview with The Atlantic this summer, where she levied criticism against the president's handling of Syria.

In the interview, Clinton said that she would have armed the Syrian opposition two years ago, and suggested failing to do so had enabled the rise of the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

"The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against [Syrian President Bashar] Assad — there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle — the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," Clinton said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton subsequently called Obama to tell him the remark was not intended as an attack on him or his policies, according to a spokesman.

Last week, Obama won congressional authorization for a program to train and equip the moderate Syrian opposition as part of the administration's fight against ISIS. White House officials have defended the move, saying that they used the time to properly vet which rebels would receive U.S. arms and training.

The president did not discuss that program or the first round of airstrikes launched against ISIS and al Qaeda targets in Syria during his speech to CGI.

Instead, the president highlighted efforts to assist civil society groups by his administration. Obama on Tuesday will issue a new presidential memorandum requiring federal agencies to consult regularly with civil society groups and resist efforts by foreign governments to limit American assistance to activists.

"When people are free to speak their minds and hold their leaders accountable, governments are more responsible and effective," Obama said.

"Partnering [with] and protecting civil society groups around the world is now a mission across the U.S. government," he added.

The president also levied criticism at countries where free speech rights were restricted — including, notably, Russia, China, and Venezuela — accusing those governments of "relentless crackdowns vilifying legitimate dissent."

"The United States will not stop speaking out for the human rights of all people and pushing governments to uphold those rights," Obama said.

Los Angeles Times column: Doyle McManus: "Clinton's lead among Democrats in 2016 is clear -- which is complicated"

By Doyle McManus

September 23, 2014, 5:47 p.m. EDT

The 2016 presidential election is more than two years away. Heck, the 2014 midterm election is still more than a month away. But it's never too early to speculate about presidential nominations, especially for politicians who are thinking about running.

It's no surprise that potential Republican candidates are already stumping around the country asking voters and contributors to take a look. Their field is wide open.

But it's a little more complicated for Democrats, with Hillary Rodham Clinton holding what looks like an unshakable lead in their polls. Still, at least four other Democrats are said to be thinking about jumping into the race — former Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and Vice President Joe Biden — as well as Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent who caucuses with the party.

"She's going to be challenged by at least two or three others," predicted Tad Devine, a Democratic strategist who helped manage three presidential campaigns (and advised Sanders when he ran for the Senate). "Hillary's the prohibitive front-runner, absolutely, but that can change very quickly once you get into a primary campaign."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton would face two challenges from all those upstarts — one domestic, the other foreign.

On economics, all the potential Democratic candidates cast themselves as firmly with “the 99%.” They are decrying the long-term stagnation in middle-class incomes and calling for an end to the long stretch of tax cuts that have helped the affluent.

Clinton sometimes sounds as if she's right there with them. This spring, she gave a speech comparing the current economy to “the Gilded Age of the robber barons.” But she hasn't been specific about the remedies she'd propose, and her would-be competitors have sounded tougher on Wall Street, a position sure to win favor from economic liberals.

Sanders, a self-described “democratic socialist,” has said that if he runs, “My job is to take on the billionaire class.”

And Schweitzer, a folksy, mercurial rancher turned politician, has publicly criticized Clinton's reliance on high-finance contributors. “If you can judge a person's character by the company they keep, in politics you can judge a person by the money they seek,” he told the Wall Street Journal.

On foreign policy, presumably one of Clinton's selling points, she could find herself sandwiched between critics from the left and right.

Sanders, to Clinton's left on most issues, has frequently noted that he voted against the Iraq war in 2002 (Clinton voted for it), and last week he voted against authorizing the Obama administration to arm Syrian rebels.

Webb, who has staked out domestic positions to Clinton's right, is (to stretch an analogy) the Rand Paul of the Democratic Party — skeptical about most uses of military force. He opposed the 2011 U.S. intervention in Libya that Clinton championed. Last week he said that he thought President Obama's foreign policy, which Clinton helped shape, was “a tangled mess.”

None of these upstarts, at this point, pose a serious threat to Clinton's march to the Democratic nomination. The only one who has registered any consistent support in polling is Sanders — assuming he runs as a Democrat — and he shows up in fourth place, after Clinton, Biden and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who insists she isn't running.

But having little chance of winning isn't likely to stop them. Some of them, such as Sanders, will run in the hope of moving the party in their direction ideologically. Others — think O'Malley and Schweitzer — will see running as at least a way to boost their name recognition, making it more likely they could land a future nomination — or be offered a place on the ticket as vice presidential nominee.

Clinton would probably prefer not to have to spend time and money defending herself in the primaries. But, at least according to some campaign strategists, facing challengers might actually do her some good. Primary challenges will force Clinton to tune up her campaign organization. And they would enable her to make her pitch to a wider audience during the long primary season.

“I think she's absolutely better off with some opposition,” said Devine. “Otherwise you're in danger of spending six months in a black hole. You don't want to cede those six months to the other party while you sit there in your coronation robes. That won't play well.”

Still, contested primaries also offer a front-runner a chance to make mistakes. And Clinton's history as a campaigner has been far from flawless. She started the 2008 Democratic presidential campaign as the prohibitive front-runner but lost to an upstart named Barack Obama. She launched her pre-campaign this year with a well-orchestrated book rollout, but made headlines by complaining that she and her husband were “dead broke” when they left the White House.

And there's always a chance Clinton might decide not to run after all. “That's unlikely, but it's still possible,” a sometime Clinton advisor told me last week.

In that case, all bets are off.

ABC News blog: The Note: "Chelsea Clinton Fears Her Baby Could Live on a 'Planet Without Elephants'"

By Liz Kreutz

September 23, 2014, 7:38 p.m. EDT

If there is one thing Chelsea Clinton is most worried about, it may be that her soon-to-be child will grow up in a world without elephants.

Standing alongside her mother, Hillary Clinton, at the Clinton Global Initiative this afternoon, the very-pregnant former first daughter warned the plight of African elephants, killed for their ivory tusks, is an "existential" one, and said that if the current poaching rates continue, elephants could be few and far between within the next decade.

If so, this means Chelsea Clinton's favorite animal could be something her child would never know.

"The child Marc and I are waiting to bring into this world could grow up in a planet without elephants," Clinton cautioned, before announcing a new commitment to stop the killing of African elephants and the trafficking of ivory.

Chelsea Clinton said the African elephant crisis is not only a "moral" and "ecological disaster," but also a "security threat," as ivory is increasingly being used by the world's most nefarious terror groups, such as the Lord's Resistance Army and Boko Haram. She pleaded that "it's in all of our interests" to stop the growing practice.

Saving the elephants is a favorite mission for the Clinton women. While making the announcement at the family's annual philanthropic meeting today, Hillary Clinton described the issue as something she and her daughter are "passionately committed" to, and said that Chelsea Clinton has made it a "priority" of the Clinton Foundation.

Ahead of the birth of her child, Chelsea Clinton teamed up with the website BRIKA.com, to launch a line of elephant-themed gifts to benefit groups working to stop the international poaching of African elephants. She told the blog Refinery 29, she's even contemplating buying some of the pieces herself for an elephant-themed nursery.

"We're very baby-oriented right now, so we'll definitely be buying a felt elephant or two. I think those will look great in our nursery. And, it's safe to say that as last year, this year too, a lot of our friends will be getting elephant-themed Christmas presents," Clinton said.

Associated Press: "Webb 'Seriously Looking' At 2016 Campaign"

[No Writer Mentioned]

September 23, 2014, 4:36 p.m. EDT

Former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb said Tuesday he is "seriously looking" at a Democratic presidential campaign in 2016, a move that could create a challenge to former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton if she seeks the White House again.

Webb said at a speech to the National Press Club that he has talked to respected advisers about a presidential bid and will continue to have those discussions during the next four or five months.

"I'm seriously looking at the possibility of running for president. But we want to see if there's a support base from people who would support the programs that we're interested in pursuing," he said.

Webb, 68, is a veteran of the Vietnam War who served as assistant secretary of defense and Navy secretary during the Ronald Reagan administration. He defeated Republican George Allen in his 2006 Senate campaign and served one term.

Clinton is the leading Democratic contender for president if she seeks the White House again but Democrats expect her to face a primary challenge. In addition to Webb, the field could include Vice President Joe Biden, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and others.

Webb said Tuesday that U.S. foreign policy has been "adrift" since the end of the Cold War and the nation's debate over domestic policy has become increasingly polarized.

"Not surprisingly the American people have grown ever more cynical about their national leadership in both parties and increasingly pessimistic about the future," he said.

Webb has made campaign appearances in Iowa on behalf of Democratic Rep. Bruce Braley, who is running for Senate, and state Sen. Jack Hatch, who is challenging Republican Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad. Webb plans to visit New Hampshire, the home of the nation's first presidential primary, on Oct. 20.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Four reasons why Jim Webb for president makes no sense"

By Aaron Blake

September 23, 2014, 5:26 p.m. EDT

It's a real testament to the fact that we're grasping desperately for non-Hillary Clinton Democratic presidential candidates when Washington starts getting a little buzzy about Jim Webb running for president.

No, that's not to take anything away from Webb's service — including as a war hero, Navy secretary under Ronald Reagan and one-term senator from Virginia. It's just that there wouldn't seem to be a more unlikely presidential hopeful than Jim Webb.

To wit:

1) He retired after one term in the Senate and didn't seem to particularly enjoy being in public life. Larry Sabato said it particularly well after Webb's retirement announcement a few years back: "He has been an excellent United States senator, but he is a terrible politician. He doesn't suffer fools gladly, he doesn't enjoy glad-handing — my sense of Webb is that he's had enough of public life for a while."

Think again, Larry!

2) Webb's niche in the race would apparently be as a more populist, dovish alternative to Hillary Clinton. That's fine, except that he was Reagan's Navy secretary and also something of a Blue Dog Democrat during his service in the Senate. Even on foreign policy, he was often toward the middle of the Senate.

Much like ex-Montana governor Brian Schweitzer (D), that's an odd profile for a guy who is supposed to be winning votes from the liberal wing of the Democratic Party.

3) He has negative charisma. The Fix believes that presidential races have a charisma threshold, by which we mean that candidates need to be at least somewhat compelling to a national audience to achieve viability. Tim Pawlenty (R), for instance, struggled with this. Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) has a similar problem.

Webb would probably make Pawlenty look like Herman Cain. He's just very dour. We wonder who would get excited about him, in the absence of some galvanizing force that suddenly makes him the perfect candidate for that political moment in time.

4) He has baggage. Yes, Webb won his 2006 bout with Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), but it wasn't pretty. And some liberals balked pretty loudly when Webb's name surfaced as a potential vice presidential pick for President Obama in 2008.

Among the hits that would resurface in a presidential campaign:

Webb has spoken fondly of his Confederate roots and defended the Southern states' decision to secede, even citing the "Nazification of the Confederacy."

He said in 2004 that John Kerry deserved to be condemned for his actions in opposition to the Vietnam War.

Webb's writings and comments have been criticized by the left for being insensitive to women.

Does this sound to anyone like the profile of the guy who might defeat Hillary Clinton — or even compete with her — in 2016?

Stumping on Climate, McCain Faults Bush (NY Times 5/14/08)

Are you worried that efforts to limit possible climate-altering carbon emissions might tank the economy? Not a problem, says Douglas Holtz-Eakin, John McCain's top economic adviser. Here's what Holtz-Eakin said during a conference call after McCain outlined his climate plan, including a cap-and-trade system for carbon allowances:

McCain calls Hagee letter 'helpful' (MSNBC 5/13/08)
By Kelly O'Donnell
McCain responded to Hagee's letter of apology to Catholics, calling it "helpful." He describes his own attempts at reconciliation over the years with, for example, the anti war movement. When asked if he or his staff brokered the apology, McCain says he did not personally broker the deal, leaving open the possibility that advisors did encourage the Hagee apology to diffuse McCain's so-called pastor problem.

In the Tracks of Ron Paul, a Candidate Goes Forth (NY Times 5/14/08)

Can Bob Barr become the next Ron Paul? Mr. Barr, a former Republican congressman from Georgia who on Monday announced his candidacy for the Libertarian Party nomination, certainly hopes so. The Budget According to McCain: Part I (Newsweek/Factcheck 5/13/08)
By Joe Miller
McCain's big promise is that he can balance the budget while extending Bush's tax cuts and adding a few of his own. He likes to leave the impression that this can be done painlessly, for example, by eliminating "wasteful" spending in the form of "earmarks" that lawmakers like to tuck into spending bills to finance home-state projects. We found that not only is this theory full of holes, it's not even McCain's actual plan. In this story we examine the spending-cut side of McCain's budget program. In Part II, we'll look at what McCain has said about taxes.

Where Bush draws the line on Iraq costs: education benefits for veterans (Seattle Post-Intelligencer 5/13/08)
JOHN YOUNG
WACO, Texas -- ...President Bush has threatened to use his rarely flexed veto pen against this measure if it contains a bipartisan expansion of the GI Bill of Rights and other veterans benefits. Bush says the benefits package shouldn't be tied to supplemental military funding. And he says it costs too much: $51 billion over 10 years. That sounds expensive, yes. That is, if you stand it up beside the Tyrannosaurus that is the supplemental bill for Iraq and Afghanistan: $195 billion for not even one whole budget year.... Sen. John McCain has sided with the president in opposing it. Although he supports increasing education aid, McCain says this is too expensive.

Mr. McCain's Honest Role in an Arizona Land Swap (Washington Post 5/14/08)
By JOSEPH C. DONALDSON (R) and JACK WILSON (D); A18
The May 9 front-page story "McCain Pushed Land Swap That Benefits Backer" did a gross disservice to readers and to Sen. John McCain by falsely portraying his support for legislation to protect public lands and address Northern Arizona's long-term water needs as a legislative disguise to benefit contributors and supporters. As Arizona mayors who were personally involved in this issue, we can attest that nothing could be further from the truth.

High Court Caricature (Washington Post 5/14/08)
By Ruth Marcus; A19
...[T]he debate over the role of the judiciary deserves a far more nuanced approach than McCain's caricature of "the common and systematic abuse of our federal courts by the people we entrust with judicial power." ... The world he sketches of liberal Judges Gone Wild is largely imaginary. The freewheeling jurisprudence of the 1960s has tempered, if not vanished. That's not surprising: Seven of the nine Supreme Court justices are Republican appointees, as are about 100 of the 166 appeals court judges.

McCain's Supreme wrongheadedness (Boston Globe 5/14/08)
By Jeff Jacoby
IN A SPEECH on the federal judiciary last week, John McCain sounded the familiar conservative call for judges who know their place. "My nominees," he promised, "will understand that there are clear limits to the scope of judicial power, and clear limits to the scope of federal power." The judiciary's moral authority depends on self-restraint, said McCain, and "this authority quickly vanishes when a court presumes to make law instead of apply it."

Truth Serum on The Trail (Washington Post 5/14/08)
By Robert J. Samuelson; A19
It's been a blast, this presidential campaign. A great story, full of drama. But no one should think it's been honest. With the possible exception of Iraq -- a matter that compels candidates to face real issues -- the campaign has been an exercise in mass merchandising. Candidates make alluring promises (to "fix the economy," "defeat special interests" or "achieve energy independence") and offer freebies to voters (more tax cuts, health care, college aid). Complete the sale: That's the point.

Subject: quick note of thanks!

John,
I am on my way out of the country for a week and had meant to send a note yesterday when I read your Politico piece.

I can't thank you enough for your leadership on climate in the White House. I remember both my clients and LCV would joke that what we needed most in the Obama White House was John Podesta, not for a moment thinking that was possible. What you accomplished — with the President's leadership and the good team you inherited — was just extraordinary. Together you all turned the issue around, not only in the U.S. but around the globe. It was a stunningly productive year for the environment.

At the risk of being over the top, there are few people in public service I admire more than you. Beyond the obvious unparalleled smarts and strategic sense, you're also a nice guy. Rare and wonderful combination.

I look forward to working with you in your next adventure. We still have a lot of work to do. All the best,
Kathleen

Climate Change Progress Is Possible

On his final day in the White House, President Obama's counselor explains how the administration is proving environmental goals are achievable.

By JOHN PODESTA

February 13, 2015

Fifty years ago this week, Lyndon Johnson, in pushing America to clean up its air and water, made a prescient prediction: “This generation has altered the composition of the atmosphere on a global scale,” Johnson wrote as part of a message to Congress on environmental protection, “through…a steady increase in carbon dioxide from the burning of fossil fuels.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Five decades later, we are living with the effects of the carbon dioxide pollution Johnson observed: more frequent and extreme storms, longer and fiercer wildfire seasons, the slow creep of sea level rise and the steady upward trajectory of temperatures. Last year, 2014 was the hottest year on record; 14 of the 15 hottest years have come in this century. Atmospheric greenhouse gases at their highest levels in at least 800,000 years.

In Johnson’s day, Congress responded expediently. The laws they passed laid the groundwork for the Environmental Protection Agency, which for more than 40 years has shown that protecting the environment and growing the economy are not at odds, reducing pollution by more than 70 percent while the economy has tripled.

Unfortunately, many in today’s Congress are responding to the urgency of the climate threat not with action, but with obstruction, skepticism, and outright denial. This week, the Senate held a hearing on the EPA’s proposed Clean Power Plan rule, which would set the first-ever limits on how much carbon pollution power plants can put in our air and vastly improve public health as a result, averting up to 150,000 asthma attacks in children per year. Republicans criticized the proposal from every angle—including by claiming it doesn’t do enough.

Since we in the United States cannot solve the complex, global challenge of climate change solely through actions taken within our own borders, their argument goes, we should do nothing.

This is a fallacy. Failing to take steps today to curb carbon pollution and other greenhouse gas emissions in the U.S. would endanger our economy, our national security, and our children’s future. And as we have seen time and again, if the U.S. steps up and takes action—if we lead with conviction and demonstrate our commitment—other leaders will stand alongside us. It’s how we have tackled pandemics and natural disasters and wars—and it is how we will protect the planet for future generations.

Climate change has already impacted our country’s fiscal health. Over the last decade, the federal government has incurred over $300 billion in direct costs due to extreme weather and fire alone. The Pentagon has warned that climate change endangers our national security—because climate change-related pressures like deep droughts, crop failures and extreme weather act as a “threat multiplier,” helping fuel instability and violence in already troubled parts of the world. And failing to act on climate change would make ours the first generation in American history to fail at that most basic principle—to endeavor to leave our children a better world than the one we inherited.

Under President Obama, we’re making unprecedented progress to curb carbon pollution at home, to build resilience to climate impacts in our communities, and to lead on the international stage. The measures we’ve taken in the U.S.—from historic fuel economy standards to the Clean Power Plan to groundbreaking partnerships with industry to deploy more clean energy, boost energy efficiency, and dramatically cut emissions of potent greenhouse gases known as HFCs—have helped spur other countries to action, including the world’s biggest emitter of greenhouse gases.

President Obama’s leadership at home made possible November’s historic joint announcement with Chinese President Xi Jinping of our two countries’ post-2020 targets to curb carbon pollution. For the first time, China set a date for peaking their carbon emissions—and demonstrated that they will begin right away by pledging to build as much energy generation from zero-carbon renewable and nuclear sources as they currently have in coal-fired power.

The joint announcement galvanized the world in a critical year for international negotiations. And as we saw this week, it forced Congressional Republicans to update their talking points, if not their thinking—because they can no longer say that China will never act.
President Obama will continue to push forward to protect our public health by curbing carbon pollution, to protect our communities from climate impacts by building resilience, and to lead the international conversation by making progress at home. Taking action on climate change today is our best hope for ensuring our children a prosperous future. Those in Congress who question the need and efficacy of the President's actions on climate change will find themselves on the wrong side of science, on the wrong side of history—and on the wrong side of the American people, as bipartisan majorities strongly favor controlling carbon pollution.

Despite today's obstructionists on Capitol Hill, we've come a long way since President Johnson's message to Congress. On Wednesday, a new satellite lifted off from Cape Canaveral, the start of a million-mile journey. The DSCOVR satellite will monitor the sun for solar flares, and send early warning to protect the grid from rare but costly damages from these electric storms. But DSCOVR will also turn its gaze homeward.

Most of the images we have of the Earth from space are composites, assembled piecemeal. But in a few months, DSCOVR will start sending us the first new images of the planet in more than four decades, along with critical new data about our atmosphere.
For the first time since Apollo 17, we'll be able to see the whole, sunlit face of the Earth—beautiful and austere and dazzlingly bright.
And ours to protect.

John Podesta is counselor to President Barack Obama. Today marks his final day at the White House; he will be taking up a key role in Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign.

MSNBC: "Republicans on Benghazi committee: Hillary who?"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

It started off so well.

The cautious optimism for bipartisanship that surrounded the launch of a House Select Committee on Benghazi came crashing down to earth Tuesday as the panel divided into predictable camps along party lines. And the rift came before the panel even got to Hillary Clinton, the former secretary of state and likely future presidential candidate.

When it launched in May, both sides said they believed it could be a fresh start on the polarizing investigation into the 2012 terror attack on a diplomatic compound in Libya. Democrats praised Chairman Trey Gowdy, a former prosecutor, who chose a Democratic member's idea for the panel's first public hearing in September.

But relations broke down head of the third hearing Tuesday, and tensions flared during the meeting. Democrats had long harbored suspicions that the panel was biding its time before launching an attack what they believe is the GOP's true target – Clinton – but the committee never even made it that far.

Republican members steered clear of Clinton Tuesday, uttering her name only once, in passing, two hours into the hearing. Gowdy clearly had no interest in discussing Clinton, referring only to "seventh floor principals" when discussing top officials in the State Department and even driving the discussion away from Clinton at one point.

When the committee's witness, State Department Deputy Assistant Secretary for Legislative Affairs Joel Rubin, said the panel had requested Clinton's emails, Gowdy corrected him. "You and your colleagues prioritized former Secretary Clinton's e-mails and that is our priority," Rubin said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Well, I would say multiple emails. If there are multiple accounts, we want all of the e-mails,” Gowdy replied.

Rep. Jim Jordan of Ohio made the GOP side’s only reference to Clinton, criticizing an independent review board because Clinton appointed most of its members.

But it turned out that presidential politics were not needed to politicize the panel.

The committee’s top Democrat, Rep. Elijah Cummings of Maryland accused Republicans of withholding key information from Democrats and operating under a different set of rules. “I am saddened to report today that there are major, major problems with this committee and its work,” Cummings said in his opening statement.

Cummings and Gowdy exchanged strongly worded letters before the hearing, with both sides accusing the other of politicizing the investigation and operating in bad faith. Gowdy, meanwhile, accused the Obama administration of being too slow to release documents, while Cummings accused Gowdy of being too slow to steer the committee forward and toward its eventual completion.

Before the hearing, California Democratic Rep. Adam Schiff said in a statement that his deep “skepticism” about the committee “may have been all too justified.” Washington Democratic Rep. Adam Smith, meanwhile, had threatened to walk off the panel.

During the hearing, Rep. Loretta Sanchez, Democrat of California, mocked the Republican-driven inquiry as a “quest to catch this mythical unicorn.” Citing eight previous investigations into the attacks, she said, “None have found this nefarious conspiracy.”

Gowdy and Republicans had been hoping to preserve and grow the credibility of their inquiry, which is part of the reason for their assiduous avoidance of taking pots shots at Clinton Tuesday. But Democrats are seeking to undermine the credibility of the panel, in the hopes that it will be viewed as a partisan witch hunt if it ever demands testimony from Clinton.

The Hill: “Clinton willing to testify before Benghazi panel, Democrat says”

By Martin Matishak

January 27, 2015, 5:19 p.m. EST

Hillary Clinton is willing to testify before the House Select Committee that is investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi, Libya, according to the panel’s top Democrat.

Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) on Tuesday said he has spoken to Clinton about the possibility of testifying at the request of Rep. Trey Gowdy (S.C.), the panel’s Republican chairman, and she “did not hesitate for one second.”

“She said ... I’ll do it, period,” Cummings said after the committee's third hearing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cummings said Clinton, who was secretary of State at the time of the Benghazi attacks, indicated to him last year that she "wanted to come in December" to testify but could also come in January.

"The fact is that she was very clear," Cummings said.

The possibility of an appearance from Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016 if she makes a bid, has loomed as the biggest question for the Benghazi panel since its formation last summer.

Gowdy first floated the possibility of Clinton testifying late last year, creating the potential for a dramatic confrontation with the former secretary of State over a security failure that some Republicans argue should disqualify her from the presidency.

Clinton is "a witness that we would like to talk to. I cannot tell you when," Gowdy said in December.

With the race for the White House set to erupt soon, Democrats could be maneuvering to accelerate the work of the Benghazi panel so that it is not investigating Clinton while she is running for the presidency.

Gowdy, a former prosecutor, on Tuesday said he and Cummings had initially agreed last year that Clinton should be brought before the panel.

But after that discussion, Gowdy said, Cummings had an unexpected change of heart.

"The deal I had with Mr. Cummings is we will bring her before the committee within 30 days of receiving all the [State Department] documents responsive to our request," Gowdy said.

He said the State Department must hand over the information the panel is seeking, including potentially some of Clinton's emails, before Clinton testifies.

"If I were to conclude this investigation having not talked to the secretary of State at the time it would be an incomplete investigation," Gowdy said. "But I can't talk to her until I have the documents that would make that conversation productive. I'm not interested in having a conversation where old allegations are repeated or a shouting match."

"I want to ask specific questions rooted in documents," he added.

Gowdy said he would be "happy to take her in January, February, March, whenever" but that it was up to the panel's Democrats on "how quickly" they get to her testimony.

"I'm willing to work with them on the timing. I'm willing to do it sooner rather than later," Gowdy said. "What I'm not willing to do is do it in a vacuum where I don't have access to the documents."

Cummings disputed that he changed his mind about having Clinton appear.

"That's not true. I don't know how he could say that because we've never been against it. He asked me to check with her. I did that she said she was willing to come so it was a non-issue," Cummings said.

"If the committee wants her to come, she's willing to come," the Democrat added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The spat over Clinton's testimony comes at time of rising partisan tensions on the select committee, with members clashing over how the panel is conducting its investigation.

On the eve of an open hearing Tuesday, Cummings released letters in which he accused Republicans of conducting witness interviews in secret and withholding information from the Democratic members of the panel.

"I am saddened to report today that there are major, major problems with this committee and its work," Cummings said in his opening statement, adding that its work is moving at a "glacial pace."

Gowdy fired back that the criticism was "interesting" coming from Democrats, given that they fought the creation of the panel and have repeatedly threatened to boycott its work.

But Gowdy saved most of his ire for the State Department, taking it to task for failing to comply with requests for witness testimony and documents.

"This is not a political exercise for us," Gowdy said. "We're going to ratchet it up because I need access to the documents and the witnesses and we need to be able to conclude our work."

The House created the select committee last May to investigate the 2012 Benghazi attacks. Republicans argue a new probe was needed to explore unanswered questions about the administration's response to a terrorist assault that killed four Americans, including Ambassador Christopher Stevens.

Democrats have accused the GOP of launching a "witch hunt" against Clinton, and on Tuesday portrayed the panel as a partisan exercise.

"Now, more than ever, I'm convinced that my colleagues are in search of a mythical creature — a unicorn, that is, a made-up conspiracy that does not exist," said Rep. Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.).

Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.) said the Republican majority on the committee made no document requests between May and December, adding that Gowdy's comments about wrapping up their work "boggles the mind."

Republicans dismissed the complaints as "ridiculous" and said the five Democrats' on the panel were hypocrites because they have not suggested any witnesses or requested any documents for the probe.

"The happiness of the Democrats was never my objective in the first place," Gowdy said after the hearing.

"They're looking for a reason to leave."

Politico: "Democrats: Hillary Clinton willing to testify before Benghazi panel"

By Lauren French

January 27, 2015, 7:21 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] But Chairman Trey Gowdy says the committee first needs additional documents from the State Department.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has agreed to testify before the House committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi — setting up what could be an explosive hearing for the likely 2016 presidential candidate.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the panel, told reporters Tuesday that Clinton had informed him she was willing to testify as early as December 2014 before the panel. Cummings said he reached out to Clinton during the early days of the panel's investigation in September at the request for committee Chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.).

"She immediately said she would do that and she wanted to come in December and then she said, 'Well, if you can't have me in December I'll come in January.' She said … 'I'll do it, period,'" Cummings said.

A spokeswoman for Gowdy said he was "not aware of any formal notice that she would [testify], just … Cummings' statement at the press stakeout after the hearing."

Gowdy has long expressed an interest in hearing from Clinton, who ran the State Department when the 2012 attacks at the Benghazi compound occurred.

The Democratic aide said Clinton "agreed to testify as early as this past December" but has not been officially called to testify.

Any appearance from Clinton is sure to set off controversy. Conservatives have long pointed to the Benghazi attacks to argue that Clinton is not up to the job as commander-in-chief, and any remarks she made during the hearing would be sure to be used against her during a presidential run. Democrats have dismissed the Republican interest in Clinton as partisan politics meant to distract their party's likely 2016 nominee.

Gowdy reiterated on Tuesday that he would like to hear from Clinton but said the panel needed additional documents from the State Department before he would ask her to appear. The State Department has sent the Benghazi panel more than 40,000 documents — including 15,000 never previously sent to Congress — but Gowdy and House Republicans have dozens of standing requests.

Clinton has previously testified before House and Senate panels investigating the Benghazi attacks, including a memorable exchange with Sen. Ron Johnson in 2013 over the White House's response to the siege in the days after Sept. 11, 2012.

"With all due respect, the fact is, we had four dead Americans. Was it because of a protest or because of guys out for a walk one night who decide to kill some Americans — what difference at this point does it make?" Clinton said. "It is our job to figure out what happened and do everything we can to prevent it from ever happening again, Senator."

January 27, 2015, 5:21 p.m. EST

Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi, said Tuesday he still intended to summon former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to testify as part of the investigation into the 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic compound in Libya that killed four Americans.

“Every witness who has relevant information needs to be talked to,” Gowdy told reporters after a committee meeting Tuesday.

If he didn’t call Clinton before the committee, Gowdy said, it would be “an incomplete investigation.”

The House Select Committee on Benghazi is charged with delivering the final word on the attack, which has been the subject of an intense political battle.

Several previous Congressional investigations into the attack have found no wrongdoing by U.S. officials, but that has done little to cool the partisan acrimony surrounding the incident on whether the State Department under Clinton’s direction did enough to prevent the attack.

Clinton, who is believed to be moving closer to announcing her bid for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, has said she would testify. But Democrats believe she should have been already been called and worry that a delay could interfere with her presidential campaign.

Her testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in January 2013 has become a soundtrack for Republican opposition to her candidacy. Her supporters fear another round of testimony would only inflame the partisan debate over the Benghazi attack.

Gowdy told reporters Tuesday that he has been unable to get documents from the State Department pertaining to the attack, which has delayed his call for Clinton to testify. He said the government has been dragging its feet in release emails and other documents.

“I am willing to do it sooner rather than later,” said Gowdy, a South Carolina Republican. “What I am not willing to do is do it in a vacuum where I don’t have access to the documents.”

Rep. Elijah Cummings, the ranking Democrat on the committee, downplayed the criticism over the release of documents. He said Clinton has been willing to testify.

“If the committee wants her to come she is willing to come,” Cummings, D-Md., told reporters. “So if the excuse is that the State Department documents haven’t gotten there, it makes no sense.”

Los Angeles Times column: Doyle McManus: “Democratic Party is suddenly a fount of ideas”

By Doyle McManus

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

January 27, 2015, 5:50 p.m. EST

Only a few months ago, it looked as if Republicans had recaptured their old claim to be the party of ideas, especially on the economic issue that has seized the attention of most Americans: the stagnation of middle-class incomes.

The GOP's former vice presidential nominee, Rep. Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.), unveiled proposals to help the struggling middle class. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), another conservative hero, inveighed against income inequality. Even Mitt Romney, the once and perhaps future presidential candidate, has started saying it is time to get serious about poverty.

Meanwhile, Democrats seemed like an extinct volcano. Many of them campaigned for November's midterm election without any clear economic message at all. It didn't turn out well.

In politics, nothing concentrates the mind like electoral defeat — unless it's the low roar of an oncoming presidential campaign.

And so, in the last few weeks, the Democratic volcano has erupted with ideas. President Obama listed dozens in his State of the Union speech, beginning with a tax increase on the top 1% to pay for child-care and education benefits for the middle class. House Democrats went further, proposing a tax on financial transactions that would allow for broader tax cuts for workers. And a think-tank task force co-chaired by former Treasury Secretary Lawrence H. Summers proposed tax breaks for middle-income folks as well as tax incentives to push companies toward sharing profits with their workers.

“Stagnation in wages and income is a choice, not a necessity,” Summers said. “A different choice is possible.”

You probably haven't seen much about, much less read, his report; It's 160 pages long and stuffed with serious economic analysis of why most Americans' incomes haven't grown much in real terms since — ouch — 1973.

But its prescriptions are serious, and they are probably close to what Hillary Rodham Clinton's economic platform will be, when we get to see it. The report was sponsored by the liberal Center for American Progress, whose founder, John Podesta, is expected to become chairman of Clinton's presidential campaign. The think tank's president, Neera Tanden, was Clinton's chief policy advisor in 2008.

And the report isn't coy about its political purpose; it sets out to update the centrist Democratic policies Bill Clinton ran on in the 1990s. “The world has changed,” Summers said.

The core argument is that economic growth alone isn't enough to ensure sustained prosperity any more. Unless profits are broadly shared, the argument goes, the economy won't generate enough domestic spending to keep growth going — or alleviate the widening gap between rich and poor.

Most of the solutions would be on almost any Democrat's wish list: more spending on education and training, more spending on roads and bridges and airports, paid parental leave for both fathers and mothers, and paid sick and vacation days for all.

And there's that corporate reform: legislation to push employers to share more of their growing profits with their employees, and to shift financial incentives for executives from short-term stock price increases to long-term growth.

The report calls for strengthening the 2010 Dodd-Frank financial regulation law, including tougher punishment for financial crimes beginning with mandatory “clawbacks” of bonuses paid to executives who are found responsible for malfeasance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That sounds like a bow to Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and others on the Democratic left who have long complained that Wall Street got away with too much in the Great Recession. But the Summers report doesn't call for breaking up or shrinking big banks, as Warren has proposed, so it's unlikely to satisfy every progressive.

It won't make every centrist Democrat happy, either. The Progressive Policy Institute, a think tank spawned by Bill Clinton's New Democrat movement, began work this week on a list of policies focused on promoting private sector growth. “We need to expand our growth agenda to attract voters who may not agree with us,” the group's president, Will Marshall, told me.

And what does Hillary think? She's not saying. As the prohibitive front-runner in a race she hasn't formally joined, she can let the arguments percolate.

She's given clues, of course — but in all directions. She said she loved “watching Elizabeth [Warren] give it to those who deserve to get it.” In Canada last week, she struck a less populist note, saying the pressing problem is “small- and medium-sized business formation.”

And she has offered terse tidbits of policy via Twitter, warning Congress that “attacking financial reform is risky and wrong” and praising Obama's State of the Union address — but adding: “Now we need to step up & deliver for the middle class.”

But for Democrats who worried that their party's idea shortage might be chronic and disabling, the eruption of economic prescriptions must come as a relief. There's a debate underway, and the front-runner even has a draft platform in hand. The Democrats won't have to wage another campaign without an economic message after all.

The Hill opinion: Dick Morris: “Hillary’s Iran problem”

By Dick Morris

January 27, 2015, 7:49 p.m. EST

The high-profile battle over congressional efforts to extend and strengthen sanctions against Iran if it fails to dismantle its nuclear weapons program has ominous implications for Hillary Clinton’s likely candidacy for the White House.

President Obama’s in-your-face veto threat, delivered in his State of the Union speech last week, has elevated this issue to the point where it has become the most important early battle between him and the new Republican Congress. Even if Democrats in the Senate cave and try to delay a sanctions vote, the stark contrast between the GOP and the president has made Iran sanctions a key national issue that is likely to have a life of its own as we move into 2016.

This polarization has made it increasingly impossible for Clinton to fudge her position on sanctions, as she has been doing for years. Recognizing this fact, right after Obama spoke, the former secretary of State backed him up, calling further congressional action on sanctions a “serious strategic error,” warning that it would “guarantee diplomacy fails” and that it might be the “catalyst for the collapse of negotiations.”

In the past, Clinton has publicly proclaimed her backing for tough sanctions and even taken credit for their effectiveness. But all the while she has been privately sending her lobbyists up to Capitol Hill to battle against them. In fact, when Congress was considering the most effective of the sanctions imposed on Iran, legislation that targeted the country’s Central Bank and made it more difficult for Tehran to sell its oil, Clinton sent her people up to Capitol Hill to testify against the proposals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They argued that making it more difficult for Iran to sell oil might drive up its prices and unintentionally give Iran a windfall profit. Wendy Sherman, Clinton's undersecretary, explained this convoluted logic, saying "there is absolutely a risk that in fact the price of oil would go up, which would mean that Iran would, in fact, have more money to fuel its nuclear ambitions, not less."

We all know how that worked out.

But while Clinton's people pushed Congress to go slow on sanctions, she took credit for their effectiveness in her book Hard Choices. Until now, she has been able to have it both ways: seeming to back sanctions while really opposing them.

But with the high-profile confrontation looming between Congress and Obama over sanctions, her deft dance can no longer be sustained. If Congress passes sanctions and Obama, with Clinton's approbation, vetoes the legislation (and it is not overridden), she will have made herself responsible for the outcome of the process. If Iran does go nuclear or refuses to dismantle any of its centrifuges, she'll have to defend the Ayatollah's actions from the campaign trail, a hazardous undertaking for a candidate for president.

Democrats had hoped that the first big confrontation between the newly elected Republican Congress and the president would come over a government shutdown where the administration could portray its opponents as being in the grip of the Tea Party. For their part, Republicans sought to avoid the shutdown trap and were looking toward the Keystone oil pipeline as the leading issue.

But now Iran sanctions have come to the fore and loom large on center stage.

Hillary Clinton is tied to President Obama on the issue. Where he goes, she will follow. The careful distancing of herself from the failures in administration foreign policy is no longer an option for Clinton. Appeasing Iran is her plan now.

Subject: A Guy from TV Martí Walks into a Bar

September 11, 2015

Dear Friends,

Stop us if you've heard this one.

> A civil servant from TV Martí walks into a bar, orders 12 shots, and starts drinking them as fast as he can.
> The bartender interrupts him to ask, "Why on Earth are you drinking so fast?"
>
> The guy says, "You'd be drinking fast, too, if you had what I have."
> The bartender asks, "What do you have?"
> The Martí man replies, "75 cents."

Okay, that was a joke.

But, when Tracey Eaton reported earlier this week that our government is spending "U.S. tax dollars for parodies of Cuban politicians," he was dead serious.

Tracey's item pointed to a solicitation from the Broadcasting Board of Governors posted on an e-government website at the end of August. This agency is home to Voice of America and, importantly for our story, the Office of Cuba Broadcasting - or OCB - which operates Radio and TV Martí.

Under the memorable title "OCBSatire," the Office of Cuba Broadcasting announced that it has "a requirement for exclusive, non-transferrable rights for a Cuban satirical variety and comedy sketch show for inclusion in its programming."

You will be forgiven for assuming the word "requirement" indicates a desire on OCB's part to spice up its dry reporting about Cuba.

Instead, the requirements are really, well, requirements that the businesses submitting proposals must observe to have their shows picked in exchange for an unspecified amount of money.

This solicitation, as if spelling out a detailed regulation to control air pollution, is quite granular. The OCB wants scripts for ten shows. Scripts must be thirty minutes in length. "Each skit should ideally be comprised of 3 segments with accompanying commercial breaks followed by a formal close."

OCB is not looking for just any kind of comedy to entertain its Cuban audience.

"These skits must be able to parody public figures, politicians, government officials, entertainers, as well as recognizable members of Cuban civil society groups who are active in the political and civil sphere and widely known throughout the Island."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, no U.S. government contract to secure sketch comedies to promote American-style free speech in Cuba would be complete without provisions giving the Office of Cuba Broadcasting the right to prescreen and censor the content as it sees fit. Really.

But, here's the best requirement. "These parodies must be uniquely funny, ironic, satirical and entertaining to a wide cross-section of the Cuban population."

The U.S. government is going to decide that? Earlier this week, we wrote the contracting officers at the BBG and asked "who will determine which proposal is selected?" We never heard back.

If the BBG lacks in-house capacity to decide what's "uniquely funny," maybe they'll get advice from the team that put up a prime time comedy show on Radio Martí that featured a cast whose actors were mostly dead, as The New York Times reported in 1985, by the time the program aired. Or maybe they'll get help from the producers of "The Chief's Office," described by the Associated Press as "a satire on the life behind the scenes in the fictional office of a military leader with an extraordinary resemblance to Fidel Castro."

No need to sound "spoiler alert" before saying these previous attempts at satire - not to mention other not-so-hilarious episodes featuring an invasion, acts of terror, exploding cigars and poison-secreting wet suits - have been completely ineffective at upending Cuba's government.

As bad as this all sounds, our complaints about OCBSatire go deeper.

First, if the contract goes to Cubans applying from the island, they would be exposed to legal jeopardy under Law 88. It forbids collaboration "in any way with foreign radio or television stations, newspapers, magazines or other mass media with the purpose of ... destabilizing the country and destroying the socialist state." Law 88 was written with Radio and TV Martí in mind; thus, the Office of Cuba Broadcasting is giving Cubans the chance to fall victim to the same law that got Alan Gross in trouble.

Second, as we have pointed out before, there are government loyalists in Cuba, as Michael Bustamante described them in his piece for Foreign Affairs, "A Cuban Conundrum ," who passionately believe that President Raúl Castro is making a mistake in his diplomacy with the United States, and think our "opening" of doors to more travel and trade is simply regime change by another name.

His article identifies what concerns hardliners in Cuba the most: the "deleterious impact" of U.S. media and U.S. offers to expand Cubans' access to the Internet for free. Jokey Cuba Broadcasting Office sitcoms play right into their fears.

Third, when ABC News asked Susan Rice, the president's National Security Advisor, why Radio and TV Martí were still pumping out anti-Castro government articles even after the President said 'we're no longer in the business of regime change,' Ambassador Rice responded "We will continue to say and do what we think is appropriate to advance our interests in human rights and democracy in Cuba... we're not going to change just because the Cuban government may wish that we did otherwise." So, there's no one can say that the Office of Cuba Broadcasting went rogue on this. The Administration owns it.

Fourth, as Bill LeoGrande and Peter Kornbluh remind us in their invaluable book "Back Channel," activities by Radio and TV Martí have previously been used by Cuba to bring hoped-for diplomatic progress to a dead-end conclusion.

This matters. Joshua Hersh pointed out this summer in his excellent review of the Alan Gross case that Cuba will inevitably raise objections to the regime change programs that threaten its sovereignty in the negotiations to normalize relations - which, as we report below, resumed in Havana today.

We will wager that when the Cuban delegation took its seats, Deputy Assistant Secretary Alex Lee did not begin his remarks by saying, "Two Cuban brothers dressed in army fatigues stop into a bar for a drink. Stop me if you've heard this one."

In its solicitation for regime change sitcoms, BBG cuts off the application process next Monday. It would be nice if someone in the White House and State Department twisted the money spigot off on this dumb waste of taxpayer money before BBG goes further and puts the larger purposes of President Obama's diplomatic achievement with Cuba at risk.

U.S.-CUBA

Update: President Obama maintains authority to modify Cuba sanctions by renewing Trading with the Enemy Act

As we predicted last week , President Obama picked a Friday afternoon to renew Cuba's status under the Trading With the Enemy Act (TWEA). The 1917 law underpins U.S. sanctions against Cuba under the Cuban Assets Control Regulations. This action preserves his executive authority to continue easing restrictions on travel and trade with Cuba, ABC News reports . With the memorandum signed today by President Obama for the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, Cuba's TWEA listing will expire on September 14, 2016.

Diplomats start talks in Cuba on negotiations leading to normalization

Negotiators representing Cuba and the United States met in Havana today to advance the process of normalizing bilateral relations. The meeting was announced via press statements released Wednesday by Cuba's Ministry of Foreign Relations in Havana and Thursday by the U.S. Department of State in Washington.

This was the first meeting of the U.S.-Cuba Bilateral Commission which was unveiled when Secretary of State John Kerry visited Cuba for the flag-raising ceremony at the U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Embassy. Josefina Vidal, Director General of the U.S. Division at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Cuba, and Alex Lee, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs, led the two countries' delegations.

According to Cuba's Ministry of Foreign Relations , negotiators began by defining the agenda for the U.S.-Cuba Bilateral Commission's discussions. The talks will first address areas for cooperation, including the protection of the environment, prevention of natural disasters, health, civil aviation, and drug trafficking. Next, U.S.-Cuba talks will focus on bilateral and multilateral interests, including human rights, climate change, and global health. Lastly, the commission will discuss compensation for damages incurred by the U.S. embargo and compensation for U.S. companies nationalized in Cuba, as well as the protection of brands and patents. The Cuban delegation emphasized that lifting the embargo is fundamental to normalize bilateral relations, Cuba's Ministry of Foreign Relations reported.

As the Miami Herald reported, the U.S. delegation also included David McKean, director of Secretary Kerry's policy planning staff, and Ambassador Jeffrey DeLaurentis, who serves as charge d'affaires at the U.S. Embassy. (Be sure to see our story on the status of Cuba's normalization talks with the European Union below.)

Foreign Affairs Committee in Congress holds hearing on agricultural trade with Cuba

When the U.S. House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Terrorism, Nonproliferation, and Trade held a hearing on agricultural trade with Cuba, Members of Congress could only agree that the island had potential as a market for U.S. producers of food and fiber, as Agri-Pulse reported.

Rep. Ted Poe (TX-2), the Subcommittee chairman, a long-time advocate for free trade with Cuba, criticized the "half-in/half-out" regulatory climate which face farmers such as the rice growers who live in his Congressional district. Poe noted that while U.S. law specifically exempts the sale of food to Cuba from the embargo, other constraints impede sales.

"It's clear our current policy when it comes to agriculture exports to Cuba is not working," Poe said, pointing to remaining financial restrictions on credit.

Under the Trade Sanctions Reform and Export Enhancement Act of 2000 (TSRA), U.S. producers can apply for licenses to export agricultural commodities, medicine, and medical devices to Cuba. In 2008, the value of exported U.S. agricultural commodities to Cuba peaked at $ 658 million; however, in recent years, this has dipped sharply with less than $300 million dollars' worth of agricultural commodities exported last year, according to Reuters .

Opponents of trade with Cuba took the position that increasing food sales to Cuba would further entrench the Cuban government. Rep. Joe Wilson (SC-2) said, "It's hard to believe the increased trade will help the Cuban people. The evidence is clear: The Castro regime had 30 years of subsidized trade with the Soviet Union and billions of dollars in European investment, yet none of the profits made its way to the Cuban people." He added, "What makes us think that adding U.S. to the equation would be different except to prop up a corrupt dictatorship?"

The Subcommittee heard testimony from three Obama Administration witnesses: John Smith, acting head of the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC), Phil Karsting, Administrator of the Foreign Agricultural Service at the Department of Agriculture, and Matt Borman, Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Commerce Department's Bureau of Industry and Security.

According to the World Food Programme , Cuba imports 70-80 percent of its food, primarily from Brazil and Europe. Karsting testified that states producing chicken, wheat, corn, and soy would likely benefit most from increased trade with Cuba. Some lawmakers expressed concern about verifying that exports would reach their intended recipients. Borman explained that U.S. policy restrictions on trade with Cuba's communist party, government, and the military remains in place.

In late July, Representative Tom Emmer (MN-6), who also attended the hearing, introduced legislation with Representative Kathy Castor (FL-14) to repeal the trade embargo. Emmer's bill is identical to the embargo bill introduced in June by Senators Jerry Moran (KS) and Angus King (ME), as we previously reported .

In an April 2015 hearing before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, agriculture industry representatives and experts from Arkansas, Minnesota, Kansas, and Texas made the case for easing trade restrictions with Cuba.

IN CUBA

Pope Francis visit prompts release of prisoners

Ahead of Pope Francis' upcoming visit, Cuba's government pardoned 3,522 prisoners, marking the largest release of prisoners since the Cuban Revolution according to ABC . Pope Francis will arrive in Cuba on Saturday, September 19, at Havana's Jose Martí International Airport, where he will offer remarks at approximately 4:05pm.

Today, Cuban media reported that "Among those pardoned are people aged over 60, those under 20 with no previous criminal record, the chronically ill, women, many who were due to meet the time limit established for parole in 2016, some of those serving a sentence on work release programs, as well as foreigners, provided that their country of origin guarantees repatriation."

This prisoner release echos past practices prior to papal visits. Ric Herrero, Executive Director for #CubaNow noted , "By any measure, the Cuban government's decision to release over 3,500 non-violent offenders ahead of Pope Francis' visit represents progress...it is safe to say that this would not be happening if not for the Holy Father's role in changing U.S.-Cuba relations... At the same time, we are disappointed by reports suggesting that political prisoners may not be among those pardoned, and urge the Cuban government to reconsider as a gesture of goodwill." The decision to release prisoners will take effect in 72 hours.

Pope Francis' visit marks the third trip by a Catholic Pontiff to Cuba; a visit which will highlight the changing relationship between Church and state, as Reuters reported this week. In 2012, Pope Benedict XVI visited Cuba and celebrated mass outdoors in Havana and Santiago; we wrote about it here .

Pope Francis, the first pope from Latin America , played a key role in brokering the rapprochement between the U.S. and Cuba. Miami Archbishop Thomas Wenski, who will accompany the papal visit, told the Miami Herald that "Cuba becomes a bridge for Francis' trip to the United States. In that sense it is very significant."

A meeting with former leader Fidel Castro is not on the agenda, and will depend on Castro's health, reports the Guardian . The pontiff will meet with President Raúl Castro. Eight in 10 Cubans gave positive ratings to Pope Francis in the survey of 1,200 Cuban residents sponsored by Univision Noticias and Fusion networks, including 92 percent of Catholics.

31 percent of Cuba's youth work in private sector

This week official figures from Cuba's government showed that 31 percent of employed young people in Cuba work in the private sector, reported Fox News Latino .

Primary forms of employment for youth include food preparation and sales, cargo, and passenger transport according to the head of employment in the Labor and Social Security Ministry, Jesús Otamendiz.

The majority of Cuban youth continue to be employed in the state sector. In the context of a country where the percent of those above the age of 60 is expected to rise to 30 percent by 2030, employment is a central issue in addressing a contracting workforce.

The movement of workers from the state sector to the private sector is one of President Raúl Castro's stated goals as part of Cuba's economic evolution. In 2010, Castro announced plans to eliminate 500,000 state sector jobs as part of his "update" to socialism.

That roughly corresponds to the 500,000 Cubans, according to Bloomberg Business , who have registered as self-employed workers in professions legalized by the government's reforms, "but economists figure the actual number is closer to 2 million-40 percent of the workforce-including state workers and farmers who moonlight in the private sector."

Experts at the Center for Youth Studies (Centro de Estudios sobre la Juventud) explain that alternative forms of employment to state jobs are interesting to students, offering opportunities as well as challenges.

The Center for Democracy in the Americas published a report on the evolution of Cuba's economy that can be found here.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

EU and Cuba open new round of normalization talks

This week, the European Union and Cuba began the toughest round of talks on normalizing ties, according to Reuters .

After five rounds of discussions that left agreements on trade and cooperation nearly complete, the bilateral talks have now shifted to discussing a new political agreement to replace the now-abandoned "Common Position" of the EU.

Ambassador Herman Portocarero, the EU's top diplomat in Havana, reaffirmed the EU's commitment to advocating for human rights in Cuba, but looks forward with a pragmatic approach, saying "Our differences aren't new and we didn't just discover them in June. We agree on a lot of points, but on other issues we are so far agreeing to disagree."

In 2008, the EU began to reexamine its Common Position on Cuba, which predicates restoring deeper ties with Cuba on democratic reforms. Citing the failure of the Common Position to achieve its goals as well as fundamental changes taking place in Cuba on the socio-economic dimension, the EU decided to move forward in pursuing improved bilateral relations, according to top EU negotiator Christian Leffler .

Leffler views U.S. engagement with Cuba positively, saying in a March news conference that U.S.-Cuba rapprochement "lifts a cloud that has been hanging over the region ... for a long time (and) opens new possibilities. The two processes complement each other and we very much welcome the step of the United States away from confrontation." For his part, Jesús Posada, speaker of the lower house of Spain's parliament, expressed hope this week that "Spain as a member of the European Union will do all it can" to help U.S. and Cuba chart a "positive path," according to Fox News Latino.

Cuba's Vice President Miguel Diaz-Canel leads official delegation to North Korea

On Saturday, Cuba's Vice President Miguel Diaz-Canel met with Kim Jon Un, North Korea's Supreme Leader, to celebrate 55-years of bilateral relations between North Korea and Cuba according to the International Business Times .

North Korean officials visited Cuba in 2013 and in 2015. The latest visit of North Korean officials to Cuba likely included a request for food aid, according to Progreso Weekly . Historically, Cuba-North Korea relations have been "fraternal" and Cuban news sources affirm that governmental ties between the two countries are "strong." In 1960, Che Guevara visited North Korea and in 1986, Fidel Castro traveled there.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last week, Diaz-Canel visited both Russia and China to reaffirm bi-lateral relations. Vice President Diaz-Canel is expected to replace President Raúl Castro when Castro retires in 2018.

Chilean lawmaker arrested during Ladies in White protest
On Monday, Chilean lawmaker Felipe Kast claimed that he was detained in Havana for participating in a protest with the Ladies in White in Havana. The Ladies in White were formed by mothers and daughters of dissidents jailed in Cuba following a crackdown in 2003.

Kast told reporters upon his arrival back in Santiago on Monday that, "Without any dialogue, a shock group of the Castro regime arrived; they proceeded to beat those of us who were marching, without asking us for any identification and they arrested us." Kast does not believe that the police knew he was a Chilean lawmaker. Kast calls his detention an "excess of violence" and claims that he was beaten, questioned, and kept out of communication for three hours, according to CNN Chile .

Kast went to Havana to visit relatives and did not inform Chile's embassy that he would participate in the protest. Chilean Foreign Minister Heraldo Muñoz finished his official visit to Cuba on September 5, the day before Kast's arrest. Kast thanked Muñoz and Chile's Ambassador to Cuba, Gonzalo Mendoza, for working to obtain his quick release.

Kast requested that Foreign Minister Heraldo Muñoz submit a note of protest on his behalf. Muñoz communicated that he would ask Gonzalo Mendoza for more information on what happened while Kast was in Cuba.

ARLINGTON, VA — U.S. Senator John McCain will deliver the following remarks as prepared for delivery to the 2008 National Urban League Annual Conference in Orlando, Florida, today at 11:00 a.m. EDT:

Thank you, Marc, for the introduction. I appreciate your kind invitation and this warm welcome to Orlando and to the Urban League. Through all the business cycles and political cycles of almost a century, this organization has championed an agenda of economic growth and opportunity. You've never lost your sense of mission, or your commitment to bettering the lives of African Americans and of all citizens. I'm honored to be with the men and women of the Urban League.

You'll hear from my opponent, Senator Obama, tomorrow, and if there's one thing he always delivers it's a great speech. But I hope you'll listen carefully, because his ideas are not always as impressive as his rhetoric. And this is especially true in the case of the Urban League's agenda of opportunity. Your Opportunity Compact speaks of the urgent need to reform our public schools, create jobs, and help small businesses grow. You understand that persistent problems of failing schools and economic stagnation cannot be solved with the same tired ideas and pandering to special interests that have failed us time and again. And you know how much the challenges have changed for those who champion the cause of equal opportunity in America.

Equal access to public education has been gained. But what is the value of access to a failing school? Equal employment opportunity is set firmly down in law. But with jobs becoming scarcer — and more than 400,000 Americans t hrown out of work just this year — that can amount to an equal share of diminished opportunity. For years, business ownership by African Americans has been growing rapidly. This is all to the good, but that hopeful trend is threatened in a struggling economy — with the cost of energy, health care, and just about everything else rising sharply.

As in other challenges African Americans have overcome, these problems require clarity of purpose. They require the solidarity of groups like the Urban League. And, at times, they also require a willingness to break from conventional thinking.

Nowhere are the limitations of conventional thinking any more apparent than in education policy. After decades of hearing the same big promises from the public education establishment, and se eing the same poor results, it is surely time to shake off old ways and to demand new reforms. That isn't just my opinion; it is the conviction of parents in poor neighborhoods across this nation who want better lives for their children.

Just ask the families in New Orleans who will soon have the chance to remove their sons and daughters from failing schools, and enroll them instead in a school-choice scholarship program. That program in Louisiana was proposed by Democratic state legislators and signed into law by Governor Bobby Jindal. Just three years after Katrina, they are bringing real hope to poor neighborhoods, and showing how much can be achieved when both parties work together for real reform. Or ask parents in the disadvantaged neighborhoods of Washington, D.C. whether they want more choices in education. The District's Opportunity Scholarship program serves more than 1,900 boys and girls from families with an average income of 23,000 dollars a year. And more than 7,000 more families have applied for that program. What they all have in common is the desire to get their kids into a better school.

Democrats in Congress, including my opponent, oppose the D.C. Opportunity Scholarship program. In remarks to the American Federation of Teachers last month, Senator Obama dismissed public support for private school vouchers for low-income Americans as, "tired rhetoric about vouchers and school choice." All of that went over well with the teachers union, but where does it leave families and their children who are stuck in failing schools?

Over the years, Americans have heard a lot of "tired rhetoric" about education. We've heard it in the endless excuses of people who seem more concerned about their own position than about our children. We've heard it from politicians who accept the status quo rather than stand up for real change in our public schools. Parents ask only for schools that are safe, teachers who are competent, and diplomas that open doors of opportunity. When a public school fails, repeatedly, to meet these minimal objectives, parents ask only for a choice in the education of their children. Some parents may choose a better public school. Some may choose a private school. Many will choose a charter school. No entrenched bureaucracy or union should deny parents that choice and children that opportunity.

We should also offer more choices to those who wish to become teachers. Many thousands of highly qualified men and women have great knowledge, wisdom, and experience to offer public school students. But a monopoly on teacher certification prevents them from getting that chance. You can be a Nobel Laureate and not qualify to teach in most public schools today because they don't have all the proper credits in educational "theory" or "methodology." All they have is learning and the desire and ability to share it. If we're putting the interests of students first, then those qualifications should be enough.

If I am elected president, school choice for all who want it, an expansion of Opportunity Scholarships, and alternative certification for teachers will all be part of a serious agenda of education reform. I will target funding to recruit teachers who graduate in the top 25 percent of their class, or who participate in an alternative teacher recruitment program such as Teach for America, the American Board for Certification of Teacher Excellence, and the New Teacher Project.

We will pay bonuses to teachers who take on the challenge of working in our most troubled schools — because we need their fine minds and good hearts to help turn those schools around. We will award bonuses as well to our highest-achieving teachers. And no longer will we measure teacher achievement by conformity to process. We will measure it by the success of their students.

Moreover, the funds for these bonuses will not be controlled by faraway officials — in Washington, in a state capital, or even in a district office. Under my reforms, we will put the money and the responsibilities where they belong — in the office of the school principal. One reason charter schools are so successful, and so sought after by parents, is that principals have spending discretion. And I intend to give that same discretion to public school principals. No longer will money be spent on rigid and often meaningless formulas. Relying on the good judgment and first-hand knowledge of school principals, education money will be spent in service to public school students.

Under my reforms, parents will exercise freedom of choice in obtaining extra help for children who are falling behind. As it is, federal aid to parents for tutoring for their children has to go through another bureaucracy. They can't purchase the tutoring directly, without dealing with the same education establishment that failed their children in the first place. These needless restrictions will be removed. If a student needs extra help, parents will be able to sign them up to get it, with direct public support.

Some of these reforms, and others, are contained in a Statement of Principles drafted by a group dedicated to finally changing the status quo in our education system. The Education Equality Project has brought together leaders from all across the political spectrum, including school Chancellor Joel Klein and Mayor Michael Bloomberg of New York City. Chancellor Klein is a strong supporter of charter schools, because he understands that fundamental reform is needed. As he puts it, "in large urban areas the culture of public education is broken. If you don't fix this culture, then you are not going to be able to make the kind of changes that are needed." Among others who share this conviction are Mayor Cory Booker of Newark, Chancellor Michelle Rhee of Washington, and Harold Ford, Junior. You know that a reform movement is truly bipartisan when J.C. Watts and Al Sharpton are both members. And today I am proud to add my name as well to the list of those who support the aims and principles of the Education Equality Project.

But one name is still missing, Senator Obama's. My opponent talks a great deal about hope and change, and education is as good a test as any of his seriousness. The Education Equality Project is a practical plan for delivering change and restoring hope for children and parents who need a lot of both. And if Senator Obama continues to defer to the teachers unions, instead of committing to real reform, then he should start looking for new slogans.

Over the years, the Urban League has brought enormous good into the life of our country — by broadening the reach of economic opportunity. There was a time when economists took little if any notice at all of the poverty of black communities. Even in times of general economic growth, many lived in a per petual recession, and the jobs available didn't promise much upward mobility. Our country still has a lot of progress to make on this score. But with 1.2 million businesses today owned and operated by African Americans, more and more are no longer just spectators on the prosperity of our country. They are stakeholders. As much as anyone else, they count on their government to help create the conditions of economic growth — and, as president, I intend to do just that.

Senator Obama and I have fundamental differences on economic policy, and many of them concern tax rates. He supports proposals to raise top marginal rates paid by small business and families, to raise tax rates on those with taxable incomes of more than 32,000 dollars, raise capital gains taxes, raise taxes on dividends, raise payroll taxes and raise estate taxes. That's a whole lot of raising, and for million s of families, individuals, and small businesses it will mean a lot less money to spend, save and invest as they see fit.

For my part, I believe that in a troubled economy, when folks are struggling to afford the necessities of life, higher taxes are the last thing we need. The economy isn't hurting because workers and businesses are under-taxed. Raising taxes eliminates jobs, hurts small businesses, and delays economic recovery.

Under my plan, we will preserve the current low rates as they are, so businesses large and small can hire more people. We will double the personal exemption from $3,500 to $7,000 for every dependent, in every family in America. We will offer every individual and family a large tax credit to buy their health care, so employers can spend more on wages, and wo rkers don't lose their coverage when they change jobs. We will lower the business tax rate, so American companies open new plants and create more jobs in this country.

There are honest differences as well about the growth of government. But surely we can find common ground in the principle that government cannot go on forever spending recklessly and incurring debt. Government has grown by 60 percent in the last eight years, because the Congress and this administration have failed to meet their responsibilities. And next year, total federal expenditures are predicted to reach over three trillion dollars. That is an awful lot for us to be spending when this nation is already more than nine trillion dollars in debt or more than thirty thousand dollars in debt for every citizen. That's a debt our government plans to leave for your children and mine to bear. And that is a failure n ot only of financial foresight, but of moral obligation.

There will come a day when the road reaches a dead-end. And it won't be today's politicians who suffer the consequences. It will be American workers and their children who are left with worthless promises and trillion-dollar debts. We cannot let that happen. As President, I'll work with every member of Congress — Republican, Democrat, and Independent — who shares my commitment to reforming government and controlling spending. I'll order a top-to-bottom review of every federal program, department, and agency. We're going to demand accountability. We're going to make sure failed programs are not rewarded … and that discretionary spending is going where it belongs — to essential priorities like job training, the security of our citizens, and the care of our veterans.

To get our economy running at full strength again, we need to stay focused on creating jobs for our people, and protecting paychecks from the rising costs of food, gasoline, and most everything else. Above all, we need to get a handle on the cost of oil and gasoline, and to regain energy independence for America.

All across our country, people are hurting. Small farmers, truckers, and taxi drivers are unable to cover their costs. Small business owners are struggling to meet their payrolls. The cost of living is rising, and the value of paychecks is falling. Yet even now, with the price of gasoline still around four dollars per gallon, the Congress has done exactly nothing.

Most Americans understand that producing more of something will lower its price. And if I am elected president, this nation will move quickly to increase our own energy production. Last month, the President finally lifted the executive ban on offshore oil and gas exploration, and called on Congress to lift its ban as well. Lifting that ban could seriously lower the price of oil — and Congress should get it done immediately. We need to drill more, drill now, and pay less at the pump. [repeats w/ emphasis]

Under my energy plan, the Lexington Project, we will also make use of America's vast coal reserves. As president, I will commit this nation to a concerted effort to make clean coal a reality and create jobs in hard-pressed regions. And America will pursue the goal of building 45 nuclear power plants before 2030, which will generate not only much-needed electricity but some 700,000 jobs as well. We will also accelerate the development of wind and solar power and other renewable technologies, and we will help automakers design and sell cars that don't depend on gasoline. Production of hybrid, flex-fuel, and electric cars will bring America closer to energy independence. And it will bring jobs to auto plants, parts manufacturers, and the communities that support them.

Regaining control over the cost and supply of energy in America will not be easy, and it will not happen quickly. But no challenge to our economy is more urgent. And you have my pledge that if I am president, we're going to get it done.

Our country is passing through a very tough time. But Americans have been through worse, and beaten longer odds. The men and women of the Urban League know more than most about facing long odds, and overcoming adversity. For 98 years, this organization has been at the center of the great and honorable cause of equal opportunity for every American. I'm here today as an admirer and a fellow American, an association that means more to me than any other. I am a candidate for president who seeks your vote and hopes to earn it. But whether or not I win your support, I need your goodwill and counsel. And should I succeed, I'll need it all the more. I have always believed in this country, in a good America, a great America. But I have always known we can build a better America, where no place or person is left without hope or opportunity by the sins of injustice or indifference. It would be among the great privileges of my life to work with you in that cause. Thank you all very much.

Question & Answer

- 1Q) MORIAL: We're spending $275M/ day on war in Iraq. In order to accomplish what you want w/ education and energy, you'd need some expansion of resources. If and when the war winds down, where would you direct those resources? And when do you think that might take place?
    - MCCAIN: Last month in Iraq, the least # of casualties in any month since war began. Every casualty is grievous, but it's evidence that surge strategy has succeeded. Our troops will be coming home, but in victory. I've fought for the surge for a long time, and it wasn't easy. I think it'll save us billions and billions as troops come home and Iraqis take over in Iraq. But we've got a big challenge ahead of us in Afghanistan and by Islamic extremists elsewhere in the world in places we're not anticipating b/c AQ trying to establish cells. I'd sit down with you Marc for your priorities. Priorities include small business, housing; also to restrain spending and use the dollars to areas where those most in need need it most. We need to do it in effective fashion. Many of the Great Society programs didn't succeed b/c we used Big Govt solutions and not local solutions. Your Opportunity Compact is a great model.

- 2Q) Do you endorse our Opportunity Compact? What assurances do we have that you'll continue to support us since you didn't come last year? What's been your relationship with AZ's Urban LEague?
    - MCCAIN: I've worked with minorities in my state and gotten majorities of their votes. I don't endorse every single tenet of the Compact. Americans are angry with us b/c we don't work for Americans, we work for our party first. I will put our country first. Can I mention 1 more thing - at the time of the Convention last year, my candidacy was in a bit of trouble.

- 3Q) re Ward Connerly's proposal on affirmative action - Would you want to eliminate programs?
    - MCCAIN: "Affirmative action is in the eye of the beholder" We should provide equal opportunities for all Americans adn Americans reject a quota system. I don't think any of these systems we're talking about eliminate our support for small business. I will continue my fight for equal opportunity for all Americans. Colin Powell and promoted woman to 4-star general are great examples of ways that people can succeed without a quota system.

- 4Q) Morial should be running for POTUS -- he's incredible [MCCAIN: Can we have a photo-op? (laughs)] I'm concerned about guns b/c we're losing more black males in the black community. So what do you think about that? These are some of teh most developed black Americans, but we're still looked down upon. What are you going to do about that - you're talking about charter schools, but we've got every degree - how are you going to help us be treated by adults?
    - MCCAIN: That's inspiring, keep going. It's hard to follow that. What I appreciate the most about Townhall meetings is being able to address the passion, love that you're all about. I wish Obama had accepted my invitation to join me in these town halls. Becuase I want him to respond. People are tired of the sound bites. They want to hear from both of us. I can't match your experience and your passion. But I'm inspired by your passion. I assure you, I have an idea of what it's like to be deprived of your rights. And I learned to love America when I was deprived of its freedom.
    - MCCAIN: Charter schools in NOLA are succeeding. They're not the answer but they're the part of the answer.
    - FOLLOWUP: With all due respect, the issue is not charter schools. We've got Howard to Harvard, the best of schools, we've already succeeded. But when we go out into America, and there's still a ceiling. Open up the doors! Help us and then we'll help them. Charter schools aren't the answer.
    - MCCAIN: I'll do everything in my power to help these educated people. But don't you also feel an obligation to the next generation living in poverty to open the doors to them?

- 5Q) I appreciate your response to some of the Ward Connerly attacks on affirmative action. Your expedient response has been you're against quotas. but when you look at higher ed, and when affirmative action is gone, the lessening of African Americans presence in classrooms? Would you tailor your repsonse to just quotas.
    - MCCAIN: If we improve the education of all Americans, particularly in lower-class neighborhoods, they have more opportunities. Even if we accept them on quota basis, their opportunity to learn is diminished b/c their education was lower-quality. Everyone should have chance for quality education in school of their choice.
    - FOLLOWUP: In all due respect, [MCCAIN: I always love that phrase], having a scholarship tailored to African Americans is not a quota.
    - MCCAIN: I believe all areas of education have to be improved, starting with Pre-K.

- Marc Morial - time is an adversary. just ask 1 question, no preface.
- MCCAIN: Keep drilling offshore, my friend!

- 6Q) 10+ years before benefit from offshore drilling and only 3% of oil we would get would be from offshore drilling. And it'd be about 10 years before we'd see effect at pump.
    - MCCAIN: I don't agree. In fact, I met w/ oil execs in CA the other day, adn they said using existing facilities we can expand existing resources w/in months, acc. to these execs. It is economics that if you have greater supply, it affects the price. And when I talk to oil execs, the ones who actually do it, we can see results.

McCain says "aye," and nothing else: The GOP nominee, so resolute last week to get the House to pass the bailout plan, goes mysteriously mum. (AP 10/02/08)
By Laurie Kellman and Liz Sidoti
The Republican presidential candidate who took the economic bailout so seriously that he suspended his campaign last week stayed quiet when it came time to vote on it….Before the roll was called, Arizona's McCain dined in Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell's office.
When the series of votes were called, McCain did not acknowledge Obama as he passed by; Obama later initiated a handshake.

Will water be McCain's Waterloo in Colorado? (Denver Post blog 10/01/08)
by Bob Ewegen
The Barack Obama campaign is now running radio ads in Colorado attacking John McCain for talking about renegotiating the Colorado River Compact, according to the Pueblo Chieftain.
The Chieftain is the newspaper that first broke the story of McCain suggesting that the seven-state, 1922 River compact be renegotiated to allocate more water to his home state of Arizona as well as Nevada and California in an interview with veteran reporter Charles Ashby.
Within what seemed nano-seconds, McCain's comments prompted Colorado Democrats and Republicans to put aside their differences and denounce the GOP Presidential candidate's musings.

McCain opposes regulation -- until he supports it (LA Times 10/02/08)
By Noam N. Levey,
WASHINGTON -- As financial collapse threatened Wall Street and consumed Washington, John McCain appeared to undergo a dramatic transformation. The candidate who would shrink government became the candidate who would bulk it up.
Just a day after debuting a television ad warning that "big government casts a big shadow on us all," the Republican presidential hopeful told business leaders in Wisconsin that a new federal agency was needed to intervene in the markets. "Government," he said, "has a clear responsibility to act."

McCain: the angry Warrior? (WaPo blog 10/01/08)
By Chris Cillizza

The re-emergence of the angrier McCain -- if even for only one interview -- comes at a bad time for his campaign. A series of state polls in key battlegrounds released today show him well behind, and the latest Washington Post/ABC News survey, which put Obama at 50 percent and McCain at 46 percent, showed significant voter doubts about McCain temperament.

Obama, McCain Stand United In Pressing Hard for Rescue (WaPo 10/02/08)
By Jonathan Weisman
McCain declined to speak on the measure, leaving his Arlington condominium after 7 p.m. to make a belated, 8:20 entrance when most other senators had already reached the floor….On the Senate floor, Obama crossed the well to the Republican side to reach his hand out to McCain and mouth, "Good to see you." McCain looked up briefly from his conversation with Sens. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) to give his rival a curt handshake.

Make-Believe Maverick: A closer look at the life and career of John McCain reveals a disturbing record of recklessness and dishonesty (Rolling Stone published 10/16/08)
TIM DICKINSON
In its broad strokes, McCain's life story is oddly similar to that of the current occupant of the White House. John Sidney McCain III and George Walker Bush both represent the third generation of American dynasties. Both were born into positions of privilege against which they rebelled into mediocrity. Both developed an uncanny social intelligence that allowed them to skate by with a minimum of mental exertion. Both struggled with booze and loutish behavior. At each step, with the aid of their fathers' powerful friends, both failed upward. And both shed their skins as Episcopalian members of the Washington elite to build political careers as self-styled, ranch-inhabiting Westerners who pray to Jesus in their wives' evangelical churches.
In one vital respect, however, the comparison is deeply unfair to the current president: George W. Bush was a much better pilot.

McCain's Kremlin Ties (The Nation 10/01/08)
By Mark Ames & Ari Berman
Yet despite McCain's tough talk, behind the scenes his top advisers have cultivated deep ties with Russia's oligarchy--indeed, they have promoted the Kremlin's geopolitical and economic interests, as well as some of its most unsavory business figures, through greedy cynicism and geopolitical stupor. The most notable example is the tale of how McCain and his campaign manager, Rick Davis, advanced what became a key victory for the Kremlin: gaining control over the small but strategically important country of Montenegro.

Davis and the Oligarchs (Politcio blog 10/01/08)
By Ben Smith
The Nation has a story today, however, suggesting those interests may haved intersected in the mini-state of Montenegro. Mark Ames, a longtime skeptic of U.S. Russia policy, and Ari Berman, suggest that McCain's support of that country's independence played into the hands of Putin and Russian oligarchs who were shopping for a Mediterranean outpost, and who basically captured the small independent state.
Unlikely to turn the race in Ohio, but worth a read.

Ms. Palin has approved increased spending for education and the elderly, sued the federal government for listing the polar bear as a threatened species, and pushed for a bill that would have reduced state regulation of new medical facilities.
But by and large, oil and gas issues have dominated her tenure.

Couric-Palin: The Supreme Court Question (NYT blog 10/01/08)
By Katharine Q. Seelye
In response to a follow-up question by Ms. Couric, Ms. Palin said she believed there was an inherent right to privacy in the Constitution. That view is sharply at odds with some conservatives, who believe that the court was wrong to cite a right to privacy as the basis of its 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade, which established a constitutional right to abortion.
Ms. Palin did not say how she could believe in a right to privacy and oppose Roe v. Wade. After Ms. Couric called the right to privacy "the cornerstone" of the decision, Ms. Palin again said she believed in a right to privacy:

Estimates show Palin assets top $1 million (AP 10/01/08)
By SHARON THEIMER and BRETT J. BLACKLEDGE
WASILLA, Alaska (AP) -- Sarah Palin and her husband have pieced together a uniquely Alaskan income that reached comfortably into six figures even before she became governor, capitalizing on valuable fishing rights, a series of land deals and a patchwork of other ventures to build an above-average lifestyle.
Add up the couple's 2007 income and the estimated value of their property and investments and they appear to be worth at least $1.2 million. That would make the Palins, like Democratic vice presidential rival Joe Biden and his wife Jill, well-off but not nearly as wealthy as multimillionaire couples John and Cindy McCain and, to a lesser extent, Barack and Michelle Obama.

Palin's role in Arctic claims is questioned (AP 10/01/08)
By MATT VOLZ
ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) — Russian attempts to claim part of the Arctic Ocean seabed have given Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin unique foreign policy experience, the McCain-Palin campaign says, but there is no evidence she has ever been involved with or spoken publicly about them… The National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration and the State Department say Alaska state officials are not involved in their work, which includes three State Department continental shelf mapping expeditions off Alaska over the past two summers. They took place far beyond any territory over which the state has jurisdiction, department spokeswoman Barbara Moore said Wednesday.

Exposing the right's hypocrisy (LA Times 10/02/08)
By Robert Kuttner
The presidential campaign is helping clarify this crisis by smoking out the right's complete hypocrisy and political bankruptcy. After being the enablers of casino capitalism for 30 years, House Republicans are suddenly trying to sound populist and anti-Wall Street. But nothing remotely consistent with their worldview of deregulation and enfeebled government can fix what's broken. Poor John McCain tried to fish in troubled waters, only to tip the boat. His campaign "suspension" was a cynical and transparent ruse -- the TV ads and attacks by surrogates went on uninterrupted. Voters noticed.

Nixon, Bush, Palin (NYT 10/02/08)
By ROGER COHEN
I know one thing: this is no time for further gambling. John McCain rolled the dice on Sarah Palin. I'm grateful to Bob Rice of Tangent Capital for pointing out that the actuarial risk, based on mortality tables, of Palin becoming president if the Republican ticket wins the election is about 1 in 6 or 7.
That's the same odds as your birthday falling on a Wednesday, or being delayed on two consecutive flights into Newark airport. Is America ready for that?
The lesson of the last eight years is this: when power is a passport to gamble, people can end up seriously broke or seriously dead.

McCain health care plan a dangerous idea (Concord Monitor 10/02/08)
Editorial
McCain would blow up the current system and ensure that fewer Americans are covered. He wants to eliminate the tax deduction employers get for providing health insurance. Instead, he would give tax credits to individuals and families to make it easier for them to purchase insurance on what he believes will be a new, bigger open market that will compete to lower health care costs. The credits would be $2,500 per individual and $5,000 per family.

Abolish the vice presidency :The founders messed up. We should do away with the office. (LA Times 10/02/08)

Recent elections have lulled us into a false sense of security. Both Bill Clinton and George W. Bush nominated like-minded, known-quantity running mates, as has Barack Obama this time around. But John McCain's surprising choice should lead us to think again. Mexico and France see no need for a vice president. We should designate the secretary of State to be in charge until a special election can be held to replace a president.

Senate Passes Bailout Plan; House May Vote by Friday (NYT10/02/08)
By CARL HULSE
In stark contrast to the House rejection of the plan on Monday, a bipartisan coalition of senators — including both presidential candidates — showed no hesitation in backing a proposal that had drawn public scorn, though the outpouring eased somewhat after a market plunge followed the House defeat. The Senate margin was 74 to 25 in favor of the White House initiative to buy troubled securities in an effort to avoid an economic catastrophe.

Bailout passes Senate, House foes soften (AP 10/01/08)
By JULIE HIRSCHFELD DAVIS and CHARLES BABINGTON
WASHINGTON (AP) - After one spectacular failure, the $700 billion financial industry bailout found a second life Wednesday, winning lopsided passage in the Senate and gaining ground in the House, where Republicans opposition softened. Senators loaded the economic rescue bill with tax breaks and other sweeteners before passing it by a wide margin, 74-25, a month before the presidential and congressional elections.

Senate Backs Far-Reaching Nuclear Trade Deal With India: Measure Goes to Bush, Giving The President a Rare Victory (WaPo 10/02/08))
By Glenn Kessler
The agreement, which sparked fierce opposition from nuclear proliferation experts, acknowledges India as a de facto nuclear power, even though it has never signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty designed to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. India until now has been barred from worldwide nuclear trade, leaving its homegrown industry hobbled and short of uranium fuel to run its reactors. The administration said the deal would bring a substantial portion of India's nuclear industry -- though not the facilities that produce materials for weapons -- under international observation.

We've also found it successful when chatting with folks to frame energy/climate as integral to each of her four fights:

- investing in clean energy that will power the economy of the future

- protecting families from pollution

- safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence

- preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

The statement noted that the two leaders would discuss the agreement with Iran and the need to advance the two-state solution between Israel and the Palestinians. A statement issued by the White House noted that the prime minister's visit to the White House was a "demonstration of the deep and enduring bonds between the United States and Israel as well as the unprecedented security cooperation, including our close consultations to further enhance Israel's security."

Iron Dome Battery Deployed in Ashdod

An Iron Dome battery was deployed in Ashdod on Thursday, following a defense assessment carried out by the Israel Defense Forces' Southern command. A battery was deployed in the same area last month, after Palestinian prisoner Mohammed Allaan's health seriously deteriorated after 65 days on hunger strike. Security officials feared that if he were to die, violence would escalate from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

Temple Mount Violence Escalates

There's been a lively debate in Israel over the past year as to whether the country is on the verge of a third intifada. There are great arguments for and against. The debate intensifies whenever violence erupts, and dies down when things return to a state of relative normalcy. And while this argument is underway, circumstances dictate the reaction. Each intifada was different (the first was one of rocks and knives, while the second involved suicide bombers), and there can be no doubt about the current reality. These are not normal times.

Sides Busy Maintaining the Conflict

By Yossi Melman

"Where there is no vision, the people cast off restraint," says Proverbs [29, 18]. The events on the Temple Mount in the last three days and the many incidents of stone-throwing in Jerusalem, which caused the death of an Israeli man over the course of the holiday, are the result of a lack of vision and of Israeli government policy. They are the most outstanding expression of Prime Minister Netanyahu's and Defense Minister Moshe Yaalon's policy, who do not believe in promoting the peace process and who are making permanent the approach of "maintaining" the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and managing it.

And indeed, the two sides are busy with maintenance, each in their own way. The Palestinians want to increase the tension and that's why they throw stones, they disturb the peace and they clash with the security forces. On the Palestinian side, there is no unity of thought or of action. The Wakf leaders (the Muslim trust), which has close ties to the PA and to the Jordanian kingdom and which administers the mosques on the Temple Mount, don't want riots, but they have little influence on the young people at the forefront of the clashes.

The Palestinian Authority, under Abu Mazen's leadership, wants the clashes to be "on a low flame" so that they resound in the global media and in the Arab states, as a reminder that the Palestinian problem and the Israeli occupation—which are being pushed from the headlines—are alive and kicking. Hamas wants more than that. It wants to inflame passions, to stir the street, to set fire to the ground and to cause the situation to deteriorate to the point of a new Intifada.

The Israeli government, by means of the police, tries to disperse the demonstrators with tear gas, by storming [the attackers], and by arrests—time and again. The government has a problem: it feels a sense of duty to respond to the demonstrators and the rioters, so as to maintain the sense of deterrence and to appease the right wing and public opinion, lest it be seen as soft and submissive.

But neither does the government want the incidents to spin out of control. The key word is "containment" —to prevent an escalation and a deterioration and to restore quiet. The security forces have to act aggressively, but also wisely and cautiously. Any minor incident is liable to turn into an incident with strategic significance.

Already now, after dozens of Palestinians (and police) were injured on the Temple Mount, and dozens arrested, the voices of concern are increasing, as is condemnation of Israel. The UN secretary general made his opinion known, as did the spokespersons of various governments. Israel's greatest concern is of the reactions in the divided Arab world that is undergoing bloody civil wars. Riots on the Temple Mount, one of the places holy to Islam, is liable to generate a chain reaction.

Israel is particularly worried about the effect of the events in Jerusalem in general and on the Temple Mount in particular, on Jordan, its strategic ally. King Abdullah has already expressed concern, and not for the first time, over what is described in Jordan (and in the other moderate Arab states that have ties with Israel, like Egypt) over Israel's harsh reaction.

That's all the Netanyahu government needs, which has never been as isolated as it is now in the international community (because of Iran, because of the matter of marking goods from the settlements, because of the absence of a peace process, and more)—for there to be a deep and serious crisis with the Hashemite kingdom.

For 16 months now, even before the latest war in Gaza, a mini-Intifada has been taking place in Jerusalem, whose focus is the Temple Mount. It is expressed in stone-throwing, in vehicular terror attacks, in knifings. Jerusalem is burning. Sometimes on a small flame, and sometimes the flames get higher. As of now, the incidents in Jerusalem have not spun out of control and have not spread to the West Bank.

But the question is, for how long will the PA and the Israeli government be able to control the flames. True, it takes two to tango. Not all the responsibility for the impasse in the peace process is on Netanyahu's shoulders. Abu Mazen and the Palestinian leadership also have a share in this. But the risk from this status quo is greater for Israel than for the Palestinians. They are the ones living under Israeli occupation and oppression, coupled with abuse from some of the settlers. Almost anyone who observes the situation soberly, including ministers and MKs, understands this.

But in the absence of desire, ability, vision and leadership—nothing is being done. Or to be more precise, more of the same is being done: security forces are dispatched, attempts are made to disperse demonstrators, attempts are made to hold a dialogue behind the scenes quietly with the Wakf and the PA's security organizations, there is lofty talk (to appease the right wing) about stricter punishment against stone-throwers. As said: maintaining the conflict until the next time. The danger is that the next time is liable to be worse—from stone-throwing, there could be a shift to firebombs—and from there, to live weapons.

Iran Deal Players' Report Cards

By Thomas Friedman

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Iran nuclear deal is now sealed — from Washington's end. But since this has been one of America's most important foreign policy shifts in the last four decades, it's worth looking back and grading the performance of the key players.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Grade: A.

His prediction last week that Israel won't be around in "25 years" was perfectly timed to complicate President Obama's effort to get the deal through Congress. Khamenei is a bad guy. When I asked a Middle East expert friend to explain Khamenei's behavior, he invoked a Yiddish curse on the Iranian: "May all his teeth fall out, except the ones that hurt."

But he's also a clever guy. Through this deal Khamenei gets Iran out from under crippling sanctions, which his people want, by pushing the breakout time for Iran to make a nuclear bomb from two months to a year — for 15 years — but getting the world to bless Iran's "peaceful" nuclear enrichment program, even though it cheated its way there. And he's done it all while giving his hard-line base the feeling that he's still actually against this deal and his negotiators the feeling that he's for it. So all his options are open, depending on how the deal goes.

Hat's off, Ali, you're good. When I sell my house, could I give you a call?

But here's a note to his parents: "Ali got an A, but he has a tendency to get cocky. He is confident that he can pull off this deal without any transformation in Iran's domestic politics. I suggest you buy him a good biography of Mikhail Gorbachev."

Dick Cheney. Grade: F.

I cite Cheney because his opposition to the deal, which he's been peddling along with a new book, was utterly dishonest, but in a way that summed up much of the knee-jerk Republican opposition: This is a bad deal because Obama was a wimp.

No, this deal is what it is because it reflects the balance of power, and the key factor in that balance is that the Iranians came to believe America would never use force to eliminate their nuclear program. But that's not all on Obama. Republicans, and Cheney personally, played a big role in the loss of U.S. credibility to threaten Iran with force.

After briefing Congress on Sept. 10, 2007, Gen. David Petraeus told Fox News that Iran was supporting and directing Iraqi Shiite insurgents who have "carried out violent acts against our forces, Iraqi forces and innocent civilians." Iran was cited for making specially shaped roadside bombs responsible for killing hundreds of U.S. troops. Yet, even though our commanders said that publicly, their bosses — George W. Bush and Dick Cheney — refused to ever order retaliation against Iranian targets. Iran noticed.

Ditto on nukes. As Peter Beinart wrote for The Atlantic last week, Cheney stopped by "Fox News Sunday" to bash Obama's nuclear deal, "but moderator Chris Wallace, to his credit, wanted to ask Cheney about his own failings on Iran. On the Bush administration's watch, Wallace noted, Iran's centrifuges for enriching uranium 'went from zero to 5,000.' Cheney protested, declaring that, 'That happened on Obama's watch and not on our watch.' But Wallace held his ground. 'No, no, no,' he insisted. 'By 2009, they were at 5,000.' Cheney paused for an instant, muttered, 'right,' and went back to his talking points."

Note to his parents: "Dick has a problem telling the truth, and he's not alone. Some G.O.P. critiques of this deal should be looked at, but they'll never be taken seriously if the party isn't straight about its own role in our loss of deterrence vis-à-vis Iran."

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu: Grade C.

No one had more impact in getting the world to impose sanctions and take Iran's nuclear threat seriously than Netanyahu. But his reckless spat with Obama, which went beyond substance to openly endorsing Obama's G.O.P. rivals and colluding with G.O.P. House leaders to address Congress — without the president's support — hurt him, Israel and the deal.

Had Bibi hugged Obama, he could have made Israel effectively the sixth party in the P-5 side of negotiations with Iran and stiffened every spine. Instead, Netanyahu marginalized Israel. And by calling elections in the middle of it all, and forming a far-right cabinet with extremist Jewish settlers, Netanyahu is playing right into Iran's hands: Iran wants a one-state solution, where Israel never leaves the West Bank and is in permanent conflict with Palestinians and Muslims, so Iran can better delegitimize and isolate Israel.

Note to Netanyahu's parents: "Bibi won't be punished for any of his mistakes; domestic U.S. politics will ensure that. But beware: That will only increase the odds that he'll lead Israel into a permanent, corrosive occupation of the West Bank, make support for Israel an increasingly Republican cause and lose the next generation of American Jews."

President Obama. Grade: I (Incomplete).

Note to Obama's parents: "This deal makes sense; it can keep Iran away from a bomb. But Barack should go to bed every night for the next 15 years worrying whether Iran is living up to it. That's the best way to ensure that he, his party and his successors will stay vigilant and put in place an effective deterrence to Iran ever building a bomb. I hope he gets an A, but only history can give it to him."

Mandy is right. We keep emphasizing that the most significant pain point for people is that the belief the decked is stacked against them in favor of this at the top. And they're not wrong.

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas

Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.

One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.

She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.

As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.

Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.

In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.

Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder, a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch, a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings.

The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.
A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.
"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

Thanks again to all for the feedback.

"Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote.
